So the gang had kidnapped him. But what had happened to Sunil and Karim?

He groped about, moving round and round in a widening arc, till he touched an unconscious form. He traced his fingers over the face and felt overwhelming relief.

So Sunil was with him. He shook Sunil, softly calling out his name. But Sunil did not stir.

Ramu continued to grope till his fingers touched another face. For one nerve-racking moment he thought it was the face of a dead man, so cold and hard it felt. Then he chuckled to himself. It was not a human face at all, but a wooden mask, the kind worn by dancers at festivals.

As he probed further, his fingers touched other objects, sculptures, carvings, objects made of brass or steel, marble, wood and clay artefacts. So he was in some kind of storeroom. The objects around him were either antiques or curios.

Ramu returned to where Sunil lay and began to shake him violently. But Sunil continued to sleep.

Ramu squatted on the floor and fingered the electronic device at his waist. They must have been unconscious for quite a while. If lalkaka's plan had succeeded the police should have arrived by now to rescue them.

Then where was the police? Had something gone wrong?

Ramu searched for ideas and found none. They were trapped, without a chance of help from outside.

Sunil suddenly awoke, sat up with a start and muttered, "Huh... Where am I?"

"We were kidnapped, Sunil," Ramu said in a low voice.

"The Hari Singh gang?"

"Yes. We are in some kind of storeroom. Adjust your eyes to the darkness and start searching for exits."

Sunil stood up. It was pitch dark inside. He moved cautiously till his fingers touched a wall. He traced his hands all along it, skirting round objects, till he reached the door. It was locked.

His eyes were getting adjusted to the darkness. There was no other exit. He looked up. He saw only two circular vents, narrow and heavily grilled.

"No way we can get out," Sunil said at last.

"Then we wait. They are sure to come for us soon. If we are taken out, keep describing to me what we pass through."

They huddled together on the floor, discussing possible ways of escape. They considered the possibility of pretending to be unconscious when someone came to take them out and then making a surprise attack. But it was wishful thinking. The men were too powerful and too many. They knew in their hearts that, without outside help, they were helpless.

Ramu suddenly heard a door opening somewhere. A car came and stopped outside. Doors slammed and Ramu heard footsteps approach. Four men. Two pairs of feet he recognised. Boka and Ranga!

The door opened and someone switched on the light.

"Ah, so you are awake, boys," said a falsely hearty voice.

Ramu recognised it as Boka's. "Come with us," he ordered.

Strong pairs of hands gripped the boys and shoved them out into the waiting car. They were taken to an adjacent office.
complex.
Sunil couldn’t suppress a grunt of surprise. “I saw the signboard,” he whispered. “Hind Exports. They’ve brought us to Hind Exports!”

Diabolically clever, thought Ramu as they were dragged out of the car and pushed through a door. This is the last place the police will expect us to be.

Hari Singh and Company
As time dragged by with no news of the boys, Lalkaka and Chaudhuri began to lose hope. They sat in the office, drinking coffee and reproaching themselves for putting the two kids in peril.

The monitor-car had so far made visits to six establishments of which Hari Singh was full or part owner. They had drawn a blank everywhere. Only one more remained and they waited for the result. They doubted if anything positive would turn up.

Suddenly the phone rang. But this time Lalkaka picked it up leisurely, dreading a negative report.

His pessimism was not unfounded. The monitor-car reported that their last visit had proved unfruitful.

“Negative,” Lalkaka told the others.

“That leaves us with no option,” Chaudhuri commented.

“Maybe there are places which are not in the list you have compiled,” the CBI Officer said. “After all, Hari Singh was not linked to Hind Exports in the Who’s Who.”

Something clicked in Lalkaka’s exhausted mind.

“We haven’t checked out Hind Exports yet. Supposing the rogue is brazen enough to go there? We raided the place once. So he might feel he would be safer there than elsewhere.”

“Sound strategy,” said the CBI officer. “Because it was raided once, we are most unlikely to raid it again. Singh has already proved himself a cunning strategist. What you suspect is a fair possibility.”

“Slim possibility,” Chaudhuri corrected him. “But no harm in trying. That’s about all we are left with.”

Lalkaka picked up the intercom and gave directions. The monitor-car was to make one last call, a manufacturing unit called Hind Exports.

A Costly Slip
The two boys were led through a maze of corridors. Sunil noticed a few rough characters lounging around, acting as guards. Their escorts stopped before a door marked Managing Director. The door was opened and the boys were thrust unceremoniously into the room.

It was a big room, Sunil noticed, heavily carpeted and luxuriously furnished. There was a huge, glass-topped table in the middle.

Behind the desk sat five men. All five had hard, cold eyes and thin, humourless lips. The man who sat at the centre must be the gang leader, Hari Singh, thought Sunil. He was a giant of a man, tall and powerful. His head and face were clean-shaven. Drooping jowls, gave him a repulsive appearance.

His voice was deep and booming. “So these are the rascals causing us so much trouble?” he said as the boys were dragged to the table. One man stood by the boys, while another posted himself at the door.

“Yes, boss,” the man next to them spoke. Ramu knew it was Boka. “That blind one, specially.”

Sunil decided to brazen it out. “I demand to know,” he said in a loud dramatic tone, “why you people have forcibly brought us here?”

The clean-shaven man began to laugh. It was a throaty, rumbling laughter, like the rolling of thunder. It was the most fiendish sound the boys had ever heard.

The others joined in. The roar of laughter died down as soon as Singh stopped laughing.

He did not bother to answer Sunil. Instead he spoke to Ramu.

“So you are the blind boy? You go to school, don’t you, blind fellow?”

Ramu bristled with anger at the contemptuous tone, but said nothing.

Singh jeered at him. Obviously he got quite a kick out of needling him.

“Why, blind boy? Why do you go to school? Why, instead, don’t you find a place on the footpath and beg? You blind folk are fit only for begging. Help your family by earning money too, ha ha!”

The others tittered.

Ramu remained silent, though he was fuming inside. Singh’s jibes were buying them time, and time was something they desperately needed.

“Life is not for the weak and the disabled, remember that, you blind beggar. Life is for the strong, for those who possess power and wealth and influence. I’m powerful, I have physical power, I have money, I have influence. That’s why I am a king, and you a beggar.”

So that was it. He was a boaster. He was vain-glorious.

“You are our king,” said a raspy voice, dripping with flattery. “But boss, we must get to the point. No good wasting time.”
“Right, Gossain. To the point, indeed. O.K., blind boy, tell us all you know. Everything.”

“We know nothing, burra sa’ab,” said Ramu, in a whining voice. Sunil gazed at him in surprise and then understood. Ramu was playing a role. The man had a monstrous ego. The only chance they had, if at all, of extricating themselves from an impossible situation was by pandering to that ego. Sunil took the cue.

“Yes, huzoor,” he said with all the humility he could muster. “You are the king. We know nothing.”

“Lies! All lies!” Singh shouted angrily, but Ramu sensed that he was not displeased. “That idiot Om Prakash told us everything.”

“No sa’ab. That was simply a trick. There was talk in my building that the police will give money to anyone who could provide information about the murder. So we went to Om Prakash with a story in the hope of getting money. Now we realise it was a foolish thing to do.”

“But Om Prakash said you have heard of Boka and Ranga and could identify them by their voices?”

“Boka? Ranga? Believe me, sa’ab I have never heard those names before. Om Prakash was bluffing you. All we told him was that Gopalan had surprised a daylight burglar in his room and the burglar had killed him. That’s all we said sa’ab.”

“Om Prakash was a private detective, huzoor. May be he wanted to trap you. So he told you a cock and hull story like the one we told him,” Sunil said. conscious that they were being very generous with their sa’abs and huzoors.

“I, a witness!” Ramu exclaimed, as if quite puzzled. “I don’t even have eyes, sa’ab. A blind witness, indeed!”

There was a moment’s silence. Ramu listened intently for clues in Singh’s voice to find out whether flattering humility had made any impact.

Singh spoke again and Ramu noted with a feeling of triumph, that the man was uncertain.

“Did you know that Gopalan was an informer working for the police?”

“Huh!” the bafflement in Ramu’s voice and face seemed almost genuine. “You are wrong, sa’ab. He was a thief, a receiver of stolen goods!”

“That’s what the police said at first. Later they gave the true version to the newspapers. But, of course, you can’t read newspapers, so you wouldn’t know. Now tell me, if you know nothing as you claim, how come the Superintendent of Police himself calls you to his office?”

“That’s easily explained, sa’ab,” Ramu replied. “The SP came to know that someone made an attempt to kill me. It happened like this...”

“We know about that,” Singh interrupted.

“Oh, do you sa’ab? You know everything. The SP thought they might make another attempt. So he set a trap, but you were too smart for them.”

“Ah, just as I thought,” Singh said smugly. “A trap indeed, ha, ha! Do you think those stupid oafs can trap me! Listen, didn’t Lalkaka tell you anything?”

“No sa’ab, not a thing.”

“Did he tell you whether Gopalan had made any report to him?”

“No sa’ab. He didn’t even say Gopalan was a spy.”

“All right, I believe you,” Singh said and Ramu heaved a silent sigh of relief. “So all that rubbish in the papers and your photograph was simply a part of the trap. But Gopalan must have made a report. That’s the reason for the last raid. Now, do you boys realise that you are completely at my mercy?”

“Yes, huzoor,” Sunil said quickly. “We throw ourselves at your feet.”

“Good, I shall use you boys to feed the police wrong information. We’ll keep you in a hiding place for a day or two to give us time to fabricate misleading information. Then we shall release you. You will go and tell him the story I shall invent for you.”

“Yes, huzoor,” Sunil said, his head filled with jubilation.

“The police know of our operation, have our names. We shall have to throw them off the trail, and you two are going to help us. But, mind you, if you try to double-cross us, we shall get you again and kill you, do you understand?”

“Yes,” the boys said simultaneously.

“Take them to unit 7,” Singh gestured to Boka. “Keep them under guard till I call for them.”

Sunil playing his role to the last, said with exaggerated gratitude.

“Thank you, Singh sa’ab. You indeed are a king.”

There was a stunned silence in the room. Too late Sunil realised his mistake and stood rooted to the spot.

“How,” asked Singh in a slow, menacing voice, “do you know my name?”

Sunil found it difficult to speak. When he could speak again, his voice was shaky.

“He addressed you as Singh, sa’ab,” Sunil said, pointing to Gossaing.

“Lies! None of my subordinates address me by name.”

“The nameplate outside this room, sa’ab,” Ramu said, trying to help his friend by making a wild guess.

“Another lie. The plate only says Managing Director. And you, a blind boy, can read nameplates, huh? So you have been lying to me all this while? You almost fooled me. Now, the truth.”

The boys maintained an obstinate silence.

“I shan’t ask you again. The truth, you twerps!”

The boys stood their grounds defiantly. At a signal from Singh, Boka pulled out a knife. He flicked it open and came to Ramu. The blind boy flinched as Boka placed the knife against his cheek.

“The truth,” Singh said, addressing Sunil, “I want everything. Try bluffing us once again and we shall gouge your blind pal’s eyes out. He does not need them, anyway. Then we shall work on his nose, ears, fingers.”

Sunil looked at Ramu and Boka, then at Hari Singh. The man’s eyes had a deadly gleam, like those of a cobra about to strike.

“All right,” he said in a resigned voice. Then he began telling him all he knew.

The phone rang. Lalkaka reached for it, sure of another negative report.

His face brightened as he sprang out of his chair. With a few terse comments he banged the receiver down.

“They’ve caught the signal,” he said excitedly. “It’s Hind Exports all right. We’ve mobilised every single policeman in the force. Come on, not a second to lose.”

The two other men bounded out of their chairs and raced after Lalkaka, who was already out of the door.
