BOMBAY

THE last week in October we left Victoria Station to join the P. & O. mail steamer at Brindisi. The air was chill and damp, and the fog lay thick over city and river. At dawn, fourteen days after, we were anchored in the harbour of beautiful, sun-girt Bombay, and the air was sultry with the heat of summer. A rosy mist was hanging over the blue mountains in the distance, and the fishing boats, with their large brown lateen sails, were gliding away before the bright morning breeze. Steamers and brigs, and Arab dhows, with their broad, raised poops—like the poops of the vessels that sailed the Spanish Main—are anchored before us; and not far from the dhows are two turret ships of ugly, but imposing presence, meant to protect the gate of our Indian Empire. In the far distance rises into sight a well-wooded hill, and between it and a long spit of land lies the city of Bombay, whose towers and domes soar clear in the serene and transparent air. Immediately in front of the deck are the grey walls of the old castle, which has been ours for two centuries and a quarter.

When in the year 1663 Mr. Humphrey Cook and his men took possession of Bombay in the King's name, they found—"a pretty well Seated, but ill Fortified House, four Brass Guns being the whole Defence of the Island." "About the House was a delicate Garden, voiced to be the pleasantest in India, intended rather for wanton Dalliance, Love’s ...ology, than to make resistance against an invading Foe.” Ten years after, “Bombay opened itself” to John Fryer, M.D. Cantabrig., and Fellow of the Royal Society, and during that time a great change had been wrought “in this Garden of Eden, or Place of Terrestrial Happiness. The Walks, which before were covered with Nature’s verdant awning and lightly dressed by soft Delights, are now open to the Sun, and loaded with the hardy Cannon: the Bowers dedicated to Rest and Ease are turned into bold Rampires for the watchful Centinel to look out on; every Tree that the Airy Choristers made their Charming Choir, trembles, and is extirpated at the rebounding Echo of the alarming Drum; and those slender Fences only designed to oppose the Sylvian Herd, are thrown down to erect others of a more War-like Force.” Captain Alexander Hamilton, who was in Bombay within twenty years of its occupation, informs us in A New Account of the East Indies that “No sooner had Mr. Cook acquired the Island than he forthwith began to fortify regularly, and to save Charges of building an House for the Governor, built a Fort round an old square House, which served the Portuguese for a Place of Retreat, when they were disturbed by their Enemies, till Forces could be sent from other Places to relieve them.” In erecting the Fort in its present situation Hamilton considered “Mr. Cook showed his want of skill in Architecture when a proper and convenient Situation ought to be well considered”; but “As for the Magnitude, Figure and Materials of the Fort, there is no fault to be found in them, for it is a regular Tetragon, whose outward Polygon is about 500 Paces, and it is built of a good hard Stone, and it can mount above 100 Piece of Cannon; and that is all that is commendable in it. But had it been built about 500 Paces more to the Southward on a more acute Point of Rocks, called Mendham’s Point, it had been much better on several Accounts.” A French traveller, who visited Bombay the same year as Fryer, describes the Castle as "a very fine Fort in which the English President commonly keeps residence"; and the Fellow of the Royal Society tells us that even at that early date the Governor of Bombay held considerable state. "The President," he writes, "has a large Commission, and is Vice-Regis; he has a Council here also, and a Guard when he walks or rides abroad, accompanied with a Party of Horse, which are constantly kept in the Stables, either for Pleasure or Service. He has his Chaplains, Physician, Chyrurgeons, and Domesticks; his Linguist and Mint-Master. At Meals he has his Trumpets usher in his Courses, and Soft Musick at the Table. If he move out of his Chamber, the Silver Staves wait on him; if down Stairs, the Guard receive him; if he go abroad, the Bandarines and Moors under two Standards march before him: He goes sometimes in his Coach, drawn by large Milk-White Oxen, sometimes on Horseback, other times in Palenkees, carried by Cohors, Muslemen Porters: Always having a Sumbreno of State carried over him: And those of the English inferior to him, have a suitable Train."

Sir Gerald Aungier, President of the East India Company's factories and trade, was, at the time of Fryer's visit, the ruler over Bombay, "for the King, finding that the Charge of keeping Bombay in his own Hands, would not turn to account, the Revenues being so very inconsiderable," had made the island over to the Company. It was to be held by them of the King "in free and common Soccage as that of the Manore of East Greenwich on payment of the annual rent of £10 in gold on the 30th September in each year." Gerald Aungier was one of the men who make empires and bind them together. During his three years' stay at Bombay he so improved the fortifications of the place that, finding "Bombaim" fort as "stark as Deel," the Dutch retreated to their boats without any booty. Aungier quelled a formidable mutiny, and by strict discipline prepared the troops for action, and formed the inhabitants into a militia to act with the garrison. He laid out a town on the site of a few fishermen's huts, and erected houses for the factors' warehouses to store his masters' goods, a granary, mint-house, and a court of judicature. He organized the administration, and made his famous convention with the inhabitants—a wise and statesmanlike measure which has done much to promote the welfare of the island. His Imperial policy, however, did not meet with the approval of his masters at home. They blamed him "for the great charges expended, and the grandeur he used on their island Bombay." But Aungier replied that "Fame hath aggrandized the expenses of Bombay more than really it is." "The moneys expended in public appearance were, by serious debate in Council, made suitable to the decency and advantage of your affairs free from vanity or superfluity, and ever ended with the same reasons that also produced them." As for the buildings, they were judged "absolutely necessary and such as you cannot be without," "yet if you shall not approve thereof your President offers to take them to his own account provided you will please to allow him reasonable rent for the time they have been employed in your service and give him leave hereafter to improve them to his best advantage."

For twenty years Gerald Aungier conducted the government of Bombay and Surat with great skill and judgment. Then, in a letter dated "Surat, ye 30th June 1677," we read, "It hath pleased God to our great sorrow after a tedious sickness to take out of this life our worthy Presidt Gerald Aungier, who decd this morning between four and five of ye clock, of wch wee thought good to give you this timely notice, yt you might prevent all innovations or disturbances upon ye island." The Bombay Council, in acknowledging the receipt of this sad intelligence, remark: "Wee cannot rightly express ye reality of our grief wee conceived at ye perusal of ye deplorable news of the death of our late noble Presidt. Multiplicity of words may multiply ye sense of our loss, but cannot depaint its greatness.” Forty years after Aungier’s death, Hamilton wrote: “The name of Mr. Aungier is much reverenced by the ancient People of Surat and Bombay to this day. His Justice and Dexterity in managing Affairs got him such Esteem that the Natives of these Places made him the Common Arbiter of the Differences in Point of Traffick. Nor was it ever known that any Party receded ever from his Award.” Three centuries have passed since Gerald Aungier threw up the bastions between Bombay Castle and the sea, and the “old square house” which we took over from the Portuguese, and in which he lived and did his great work, still stands. Here should be placed a tablet to the memory of the man who was the first—and not the least noble—of the long and illustrious line of administrators who have made our Indian Empire. On his foundation they have built. He “brought the face of Justice to be unveiled.”

Facing Bombay Castle, on the land side, in the days long done, there was a wide tract of common land, about fifty acres in extent. James Forbes, in his Oriental Memoirs, one of the most charming works ever written about the East, has given us a view of Bombay Green as it was in the year (1763) when Lord Bute resigned and proceedings were begun against Wilkes for No. 45 of the North Briton. A company of soldiers is drawn up before the church. A gentleman with cocked hat, knee-breeches, and a long stick, with a native servant holding an umbrella over his head, is gazing at them. A coach, drawn by four horses, preceded by a company of sepoys, is being driven by the church. It may be the coach of His Excellency the Governor. A humble factor is being carried in an open palanquin, with two sepoys with drawn swords preceding him. There is a gentleman riding in a chaise and pair, as a native bullock-carriage was then styled. When Admiral Watson, the brave old sailor whose name is so closely linked with that of Robert Clive, came to Bombay in 1774 with his squadron, "palanquins," writes the surgeon of the ship, "were placed at the disposal of his sick by Government, whilst the Admiral had a chaise and pair of these oxen allowed him also by the Company. They are commonly white, have a large pair of perpendicular horns, and black noses. The Admiral oftentimes went in the chaise for an afternoon outing to Malabar Hill, and to the end of Old Woman's Island, to Marmulia and many other places. In England, if these creatures are forced out of their usual pace, it is too well known that they will faint or lie under their burthen; but at Bombay they trot and gallop as naturally as horses, and are equally serviceable in every respect—except that they sometimes incommode by the filth thrown upon you by their tails." An admiral in uniform driving about in a small bullock-cart, with his knees close to his chin, must have been a quaint and interesting sight.

Twelve years after the visit of Admiral Watson, James Forbes reached Bombay as a writer in the Company's service, and he gives us a graphic account of the daily life in the settlement, at the beginning of the last century. Early rising prevailed throughout the Presidency. "The morning was then dedicated to business; everybody dined at one o'clock; on breaking up, the Company went to their respective houses to enjoy a siesta, and return after a walk or ride in the country to pass the remainder of the evening and sup where they had dined." Forbes pays a handsome tribute to the character of his countrymen in exile. "In private life they are generous, kind, and hospitable; in their public situations, when called forth to arduous enterprise, they conduct themselves with skill and management; and whether presiding at the helm of the political and commercial department, or spreading the glory of the British arms with courage, moderation, and clemency, the annals of Hindustan will transmit to future ages names dear to fame and deserving the applause of Europe.” When Forbes landed at Bombay, “comfort, hospitality, and urbanity,” he states, characterized the settlement; and all who have had the privilege of visiting the island will bear willing testimony that in one respect Bombay has not altered.

A commanding feature in the view of Bombay Green presented in the Oriental Memoirs is the church. On the arrival of Richard Cobbe as chaplain to the island, he found that services were held in a room in the fort; and, in a sermon preached on the First Sunday after Trinity, he impressed on his congregation the necessity of a suitable church.

“Well, Doctor,” said the Governor after the service, “you have been very zealous for the church this morning.”

“Please, yr Honour,” he replied, “I think there was occasion for it, and I hope without offence.”

“Well, then,” said the Governor, “if we must have a church, we must have a church. Do you see and get a book made, and see what every one will contribute towards it, and I will do first.”

Cobbe himself gave Rs. 1,427; Cornelius Toddington gave “For my wife when I have her,” Rs. 20; and Mr. Richard Walters, Rs. 11, paid him for doing the service in absence of the chaplain. A commutation from penance corporal at Surat was Rs. 150. A substantial sum was collected, and on November 18, 1718, the foundation stone of the church was laid. Three years after, on Christmas Day, it was opened. The Governor went in procession, and was met at the entrance by the chaplain in his canonical dress. During the service a child was baptized, the Governor, Mrs. Parker (the Deputy-Governor’s wife) and Mrs. Crommelin “standing Gossips.” When the service was concluded the Governor, his Council, and the ladies repaired to the vestry, where they drank success to the new church in a glass of sack. The church was prosperous under the vigorous ministration of Cobbe, but the man whose strong will and inflexible purpose established it, could not move in the regular official routine and keep the waters smooth. Mr. Braddyll, Member of Council, complained that Mr. Cobbe had "affronted him at the Communion Table, when he was going to receive the Holy Sacrament, and he had likewise affronted him publicly several times before." From the letter which Mr. Braddyll wrote to the President and Governor of Bombay and Council it can be gathered that Mr. Cobbe had frequently complained about his employing workmen on Sunday, and that the Member of Council had advanced the plea of necessity. The quarrel culminated in the following occurrence:—

"After the congregation, of which I happened to be one, had placed themselves at the altar in a posture for receiving the Communion, Mr. Cobbe having consecrated the elements, turned himself towards me and spoke with a loud voice, and said, 'Mr. Braddyll: to which I made no answer, thinking him to be out of his senses; but he repeated it a second time, and said, 'Mr. Braddyll, have you done working on Sundays? unless yt, I cannot administer you this Sacrament.' To the best of my remembrance I told him I had. He went still further, and said he would not give me Communion unless I would promise him and the congregation then present that I would work no more on Sundays. I told him I would not unless necessity obliged me, upon which he condescended to treat me like ye rest of the community." The Board demanded an explanation of his conduct from the Chaplain, and he replied "that he was sorry to find that a person in Mr. Braddyll's station should, instead of being ashamed, make it a matter of complaint for a reproof of a sin so exceeding sinfull, but is God Almighty less in India than He is in England? Or has He given any man license to sin? Is the violation of this holy day become the less enormous, because it is so frequently and irreligiously profaned, or must it out of good manners be past by unobserved, connived and winked at, especially when it comes from so eminent a quarter?" The Board came to the conclusion "that the second Rubric," from which the Chaplain based his defence, did not apply to the case, as it referred only to "an open and notorious evil liver," and they "ordered Mr. Richard Cobbe to ask Mr. Braddyll pardon publicly in the church on Sunday morning next immediately after in the following words: 'Whereas, on Sunday the 3rd instant, through mistake, I did affront Mr. Braddyll at the Communion Table, I do hereby notify to this congregation here present, that on more mature consideration I find myself to be in the wrong, and do hereby beg Mr. Braddyll's pardon for the injury done him and the offence given him and to the other communicants.'"

Mr. Cobbe refused compliance with the Council's order for two reasons: firstly, because according to the rubric after the Nicene Creed nothing is to be proclaimed during the time of Divine service "but what is prescribed in the rules of the Book of Common Prayer or enjoined by the Queen or by the ordinary of the place"; and secondly, because such compliance "would not only give encouragement to them by lessening too much the credit of reproof, but inevitably draw contempt upon the clergy, and wound even religion through the sides of the ministry." He concluded the letter with these words: "For this, therefore, I hope, gentlemen, you will pardon your servant in that I cannot, I dare not, yield my assent without declining that duty, without betraying that trust, for which I am accountable to a more awful tribunal." Mr. Cobbe, however, offered to give Mr. Braddyll any satisfaction he could, except what the Board had ordered. But the Board refused to listen to any compromise, and proceeded to review his past conduct. Notice was taken of a sermon that he had preached at the members of the Government from the text, "Though hand join in hand, yet the wicked shall not go unpunished," and the Board declared that it was "but too notorious and usual with him to draw odious characters in the sermons and apply them to such persons with whom he has any difference. . . . In order, therefore, to secure this Government against the evils which such seditious sermons and discord may possibly have on the minds of some people, especially at this time of actual war with one enemy, and an apprehension of a rupture with our neighbours the Portuguese, when there is all the need imaginable of union and firm resolution, it was resolved that Mr. Richard Cobbe, Chaplain, be suspended from the Right Honble Company's service and from officiating as their chaplain, receiving no further salary or other allowances of the Right Honble Company from this day.” Cobbe returned to England, and lived to a ripe old age, and in the decline of life wrote an account of the church which he founded, now the cathedral of a vast diocese.

Near the Cathedral, about the centre of the old Green, is situated Elphinstone Circle, a block of commercial buildings which would do credit to any European capital. They surround a small garden which has the glory of colour that nature lavishes on shrub and flower in the East. Here is a statue to the Marquis Cornwallis, who, as the inscription informs us, died at Ghazipur, on October 5, 1805. The Indian climate proved too much for a constitution already shattered by the anxieties and vexations of his Irish administration, and the difficult and delicate task of conducting the negotiations which led to the peace of Amiens. "A peace that will not dishonour the country," wrote Cornwallis; an expression afterwards happily converted into "peace with honour" by one who knew how to borrow. Cornwallis had not the genius of Hastings, or of Wellesley; but he was a man of sterling integrity, and his death was regarded in India as a public misfortune, on account of his whole previous administration having been imbued with the spirit of justice and moderation. At a public meeting of the British inhabitants of Bombay it was resolved to erect a statue to the late Marquis. James Mackintosh, the "Man of Promise," at the time Recorder of Bombay, wrote to Flaxman:—"As one of the committee appointed for that purpose, I naturally turned my thoughts towards you, for reasons which it might be indelicate to mention to you, and which it must be unnecessary to state to any one else. It is enough to say that I feel very great solicitude to leave to our most distant successors, whoever they may be, not only a memorial of the honour in which we hold virtue, but an example of the progress of Art in England in the beginning of the nineteenth century. The neighbouring subterranean temples of Elephanta, Canari, and Carli contain, perhaps, the most ancient sculptures in the world. Twenty or thirty centuries hence, some native, whose name is now unknown, may compare these works of barbaric toil with the finished productions of the genius and taste of an English artist. Without your help I do not think that the comparison would be fair or the contrast complete."

After this delicate flattery, Mackintosh proceeds to state that the statue is to be of the natural size, or larger than life, with such basso-relieves and subordinate figures as the artist might judge most characteristic and ornamental. "I need not tell you that the character of Marquis Cornwallis was more respectable than dazzling. I am persuaded that you will find pleasure in employing an art, too often the flatterer of tyranny, to give lustre to the virtues most useful to mankind. Prudence, moderation, integrity, pacific spirit, clemency, were very remarkable qualities in Marquis Cornwallis's character. Perhaps his establishment of a system of secure landed property in Bengal—and extended over India—might furnish some hints to your genius. It was a noble measure of paternal legislation, though I know not whether it could be represented in marble."

The Permanent Settlement in Bengal is hardly a theme to fire an artist's imagination, or a subject capable of being represented in marble except in the form of boundary pillars. Flaxman, however, refused to undertake the work, and the statue was executed by Bacon. In the garden there is another statue by the same sculptor, erected by the merchants of Bombay to the honour of the Pro-Consul whose intrepid intellect and lofty ambition consolidated the Empire which the daring genius of Hastings founded; of whom his illustrious brother said:—"Had he been but a younger son he would have been the greatest man in Europe." The clean-cut and decisive features of the Marquis of Wellesley are rendered with considerable skill. His slight and wiry figure rests on a massive marble pedestal, with finely modelled male and female figures in front, and a life-sized lion and tiger behind. The merchants of the East India Company could not appreciate Wellesley's vigorous and far-seeing policy, and they recalled him. Thirty years after, when his despatches, which combine comprehensive and elevated views with so much circumspection and dignity, were published, the Court of Directors assured him, by a unanimous resolution, "that in their judgment he had been animated throughout his administration by an ardent zeal to promote the well-being of India, and to uphold the interest and honour of the British Empire; and that they looked back to the eventful and brilliant period of his administration with feelings common to their countrymen." They also voted him a grant of £20,000, and ordered his statue to be placed in the India Office. But this tardy recognition of his services did not satisfy the great Marquis, and his closing years were embittered because the Ministry would not create him Duke of Hindustan, the only title which would gratify his Imperial soul.

Leaving the garden, we come to a stately flight of steps leading to the Town Hall, which mainly owes its existence to the enthusiasm and exertion of James Mackintosh. He was anxious that a building should be erected "for the reception of the statues of Marquis Cornwallis and Mr. Pitt, and of any future monuments of British Art which public gratitude may bring to Bombay," and "for the accommodation of the Literary Society, and the reception of their valuable and increasing library." Soon after his arrival James Mackintosh held, under his own roof, the first meeting of the Literary Society of Bombay. Jonathan Duncan was present, not as a Governor of Bombay, but as a scholar who had made his mark by contributing some important papers to the Bengal Asiatic Society; General Nicolls, the Commander-in-chief, a man of science, who had devoted much time to the meteorology of the island; Boden, the Quartermaster-General, and subsequent founder of the Boden Professorship at Oxford; and Edward Moore, the author of The Hindu Pantheon, a work of considerable research. The President, in an eloquent address, stated the subjects which he trusted the members would pursue in India, because so much could be found in the land which could be got in no other country: metallurgy, mineralogy, botany and economics were the subjects which he specially brought forward to the notice of the members. The history of the Bombay Asiatic Society is a record of brilliant success. It has done the work for which it was founded—"the investigation and encouragement of Oriental Arts, Science, and Literature." In 1827 the Society adopted the proposal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland for a union between the two Institutions, and the Literary Society of Bombay became the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland.

One of the first objects that engaged the attention of the Society was the foundation of a Public Library. Early in 1805 a bargain was concluded for the purchase of an extensive collection of books which had been gathered together by several medical gentlemen of Bombay. Under the wise administration of Sir James Mackintosh, the library grew, and when he returned to England he sent out, at the request of the Society, a collection of the standard books of the day, and the principal publications as they appeared. It is due to the wide reading and sound literary taste of the author of Vindiciae Gallicae that the library of the Bombay Asiatic Society is so rich in the literature of the eighteenth century. The Society has also had frequent gifts of rare and valuable Oriental publications from the Bombay Government and the Government of India, and the library has grown up to be a goodly collection of thirty thousand volumes. Savants who visit India will receive at Bombay a warm and generous welcome from a learned Society, devoted to spreading through the land a spirit of philosophical inquiry and literary research, and owning a library rich in books of solid worth.

Retracing our steps from the Town Hall, we pass the Cathedral, and driving through Church Street we come to a spacious Platz, with a handsome fountain. The name commemorates the services of a great ruler, who, during his five years’ tenure of office, changed an Indian city into one of the finest capitals of the Empire. Bartle Frere was appointed Governor of Bombay at the comparatively early age of forty-seven. "God grant you," wrote Lord Canning, "health and strength to do your work in your own noble spirit!" He did it, in spite of much opposition, in his own imperial spirit; and no Governor, except Mount-stuart Elphinstone, did more to improve the condition of the people, or to increase the prosperity of the great Presidency entrusted to his charge. He won the respect of those he ruled by his courageous temperament, and their affection by his strong human sympathies. Man that is born of woman hath his faults; but with all his minor blemishes and infirmities, a high rank must be assigned to Bartle Frere among the great statesmen who served the East India Company.

At the corner of the Platz, where two roads meet, is a fine statue of the Queen-Empress, which stands as a monument of the loyal attachment and admiration of the great Feudatories for the first Sovereign who has, since the dawn of history, ruled over all India. The statue was given to Bombay by the munificent Khandi Rao Guicowar, the ruler of the Baroda state. Her Gracious and Imperial Majesty is represented seated on an elaborately carved state chair, which is placed on a lofty marble platform led up to by steps. In the centre of the canopy is the Star of India, and above it the Rose of England is united with the Lotus of India, and around them are England's old motto "God and my right," and India's watchword "Heaven's light our guide." Leaning against the handsome rails which encircle the statue are a group of rustics. There is the old father and his spouse, a matronly dame, two stalwart sons, black, wiry men from the coast, and their spouses—light-hearted, merry young women, whose crimson, blue, and orange robes fall in graceful folds over their supple figures. They are showing a little girl and a couple of half-naked boys, wearing gorgeous caps embroidered with tinsel, the beauties of the statue, and they are discussing with considerable volubility the Royal lady beyond the sea. Queen Victoria is in India no mythological personage, the wife of "John Company." Three of her sons have visited the land. The Prince of Wales by his gracious tact caused the great chiefs to feel that they are not merely important factors in a vast administrative system, but Royal Feudatories of a great sovereign. The Duke of Connaught has commanded a division in Bengal and the Bombay army; and in many a distant home, seated of an evening around the village fire, the sepoy on furlough has told his companions about the great Queen's son, who could address them in their own language. The private and personal virtues of the Queen long ago became known, and enthroned Her Majesty in the hearts of many millions of her distant subjects. In a remote village in the north of India a peasant had a grievance, and he called the village schoolmaster to his aid, and they wrote a letter stating the case, and they addressed it "To the Good Lady in England," and the letter reached Balmoral. To be known to distant subject races as "The Good Lady in England" was an achievement of which any monarch might well have been proud.
CITIES OF INDIA

CITIES OF INDIA

From the Queen’s statue to the statue of His Majesty as Prince of Wales runs a broad road known as Rampart Row, lined by lofty offices and splendid shops, which would do credit to Paris or London. The equestrian statue of the Prince, a good example of Boehm’s best work, was the gift of the late Sir A. Sassoon, and commemorates the Heir-apparent’s visit to the city. On each side of the granite base are two well executed castings, one representing the historic scene of the landing of the Prince at the dockyard, and the other depicting the picturesque episode which lives in the memory of those who took part in it—the presentation of flowers to His Royal Highness by the Parsee children at the great children’s fest held in his honour.

Not far from the Prince of Wales’ statue is the Wellington fountain, a meretricious structure unworthy of the great name it bears. Colonel Wellesley came to Bombay in 1803, and during the hot months of March and April worked with his wonted ardour in getting ready the transports to convey the forces under General Baird to Egypt. It was intended that they should co-operate in the important object of expelling the French from that land, and Colonel Wellesley had been appointed second in command. A severe attack of fever, however, prevented him from accompanying the expedition. He was much disappointed at having lost what seemed a splendid opportunity for active service, but he remained behind to win the decisive battle of Assaye, while the vessel in which he was to sail was lost. On October 2, 1803, Jonathan Duncan, Governor of Bombay, received a letter from General Wellesley announcing in a few simple words the hard-won contest which made us masters of India.

After his great and decisive victory General Wellesley visited Poona, and descended the Ghauts to Bombay, and the capital received him with due honour. “I was feasted out of Bombay as I was feasted into it,” he wrote to a friend. The victor of Assaye was glad to escape from steamy Bombay to the cooler Deccan, where he employed himself in writing State papers, urging a policy of conciliation and moderation. "The Governor-General may write what he pleases at Calcutta, we must conciliate the natives, or we shall not be able to do his business; and all his treatment, without conciliation and an endeavour to convince the Native Powers that we have views besides our own interests, is so much waste paper."

A short distance from the Wellington fountain is a splendid testimony of the wisdom of the soldier-statesman's policy in dealing with the native powers. The palatial Home for Sailors, whose foundation stone was laid by H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, was the gift of the same great loyal Feudatory who caused to be erected the statue of the late Queen. Near to the Sailors' Home is the Royal Bombay Yacht Club, to which ladies accompanied by members are freely admitted, and where the traveller who has the privilege of honorary membership will find every comfort, and from the deep verandah overlooking the harbour will enjoy one of the most beautiful views in the world.

Returning from the Yacht Club, and bearing to the left, we come to a shallow expanse of water, bounded by two tongues of land—Colaba and Malabar Hill. Facing the bay is a line of buildings, imposing as a whole, but too suggestive of modern English taste and conventionalism. The Secretariat, where the offices of the Secretaries to Government are located, is a massive pile whose main features have been brought from Venice, but all the beauty has vanished in transhipment. It is as lacking in sentiment as the work conducted in it, and is the complete expression in stone of the spirit of an official architect. The University Hall, erected from designs by Sir Gilbert Scott, seems to have been meant for a western College Chapel, and is as exotic as the system of education which we have introduced into the land. A few yards from the Senate Hall is the Univer-

...ity Library, designed by the same architect, which seems a little too small for the lofty clock tower, built after the form of the campanile of Giotto at Florence, that adjoins it. The High Court is a large, imposing, ugly Gothic construction, out of character with the climate; but the building is probably not more out of character with the climate than the mode of administering justice within its walls is out of character with the habits of the people.

Not far from the University, the home of modern science and culture, there rises a long black wall, from above which dense volumes of noisome smoke drift over the road, and many bright sparks float in the air. This is the Hindu burning ground, and the smoke and sparks arise from the funeral fires.

"The Trojan king and Tuscan chief command, To raise the piles along the winding strand; Thence friends convey the dead to funeral fires, Black smould'ring smoke from the green wood expires, The light of Heaven is cloaked, and the new day retires."

From a low and narrow door comes forth a procession of priests in saffron robes, carrying small bundles in their hands; behind them follow a crowd of men and women wailing and beating their breasts. They cross the railway which runs parallel to the beach, and repair to the sea, where, after various oblations and ceremonies are performed, the priests open the little bundles and cast their contents into the waters. They are the ashes of the dead. The mourners sit on the turf by the seashore, and refraining from vain tears they alleviate their grief by reciting after the priests verses culled from the Puranas. "Foolish ashes, who seeks permanence in the human state, unsolid like the stem of the plantain tree, transient like the foam of the sea. All that is low must finally perish; all that is elevated must ultimately fall; all compound bodies must end in dissolution; and life is concluded with death. Unwilling do the manes of the deceased taste the tears and rheum shed by their kinsmen:

then do not wail, but diligently perform the obsequies of the dead.” Under the shadow of the University tower the Hindu diligently performs the obsequies of the dead as they were performed on the winding shore, when “the wood was heaped for funeral,” and “apart Achilles stood.”

Bombay is the common meeting ground of many different creeds and nationalities. A short distance beyond the burning yard is a long upper-storied building, which a charitable Muhammadan gentleman has built to accommodate the pilgrims proceeding to Mecca; and facing a sweep of the bay rises Wilson College, which bears the name of its founder, the great Scotch missionary, who made Bombay his home, and devoted a life of strenuous labour to her advancement. A man of most varied acquirements and excellent judgment, Dr. Wilson became a considerable force in the land, and Viceroy and Governors sought his advice on delicate problems of State. Endowed with an unusually attractive and winning character, he won the hearts of all classes, English, Parsee, Muhammadan, and Hindu. The land and its people interested him. He was versed in their ancient literature and philosophy; he spoke and wrote some of their living languages, and without a tinge of sentimentalism he appreciated their many fine qualities. He freely criticized Hinduism, Muhammadanism, and Zoroastrianism; but his plain speaking did not impair the affection with which he was regarded, for no man has a keener appreciation of chivalrous honesty than the Oriental.

Beyond the Wilson College the road begins to rise to Malabar Hill, and at intervals along the base of the beetling rocks are patches of trees and groves of lofty palms. On the top of the hill two roads meet; one follows the crest, and the other leads to Malabar Point, “where the Governor,” writes Lady Falkland, “has a residence consisting of several good-sized bungalows.” Lady Falkland, who was one of the first to prove, by her bright book Chow Chow, that India is not hopelessly dull, was fond of staying at Malabar Point during the time her husband ruled the island. Mount-stuart Elphinstone, when Governor, built a bungalow at Malabar Point, on the site of an old temple; but a residence of some kind had existed before his day, for we read of Malabar Point being, in 1789, "the Governor's occasional retreat." Maria Graham, better known as Lady Caldecott, and the author of Little Arthur's History of England, has the following in her Journal of a Residence in India:

"August 5, 1809.—After walking nearly two miles through gardens, or rather fields of vegetables, we came to a small bungalow, or garden-house, at the point of the hill, from which there is, I think, the finest view I ever saw. The whole island lay to the north and east, beautifully green with the young rice, varied with hills and woods, and only separated from Salsette and the Mahratta shore by narrow arms of the sea, while the bay and harbour to the south, scattered with beautiful woody islands, reflected the grand monsoon clouds, which, as they rolled along, now hid and now discovered the majestic forms of the ghauts on the mainland. Within a few yards of the bungalow is a ruined temple; from what remains, it must have been a fine specimen of Hindoo architecture; almost every stone is curiously carved with groups of figures, animals, and other ornaments. Tradition says that the Portuguese, in their zeal for conversion, pointed cannon against this temple, and destroyed it with its gods; its widely scattered remains seem to countenance the report. Close to the ruin there is a cleft in a rock, so narrow, that one would wonder how a child could get through it; nevertheless there are multitudes of pilgrims who annually come to force themselves through, as a certain method of getting rid of their sins."

Moore, in The Hindoo Pantheon, writes: "At the very extremity of a promontory on the island of Bombay, called Malabar Point, is a cleft rock, a fancied resemblance of the Yoni, to which numerous pilgrims and persons resort for the purpose of regeneration, by the efficacy of a passage through this sacred type. This Yoni, or hole, is of considerable elevation, situated among the rocks, of no easy access, and in the stormy season incessantly buffeted by the surf of the ocean.” Moore goes on to relate that the famous Brahman Ragoba, the father of the last of the Peshwas, was, when he resided at Bombay, in the habit of passing through the cleft; and that Shivaji, the daring founder of the Mahratta State, had been known to venture secretly on the island of Bombay, “at a time when discovery was ruin, to avail himself of the benefit of this efficacious transit.”

About half a mile from Malabar Point is the village of Walkeshwar, one of the most sacred spots in Western India. The name implies Lord of Sand, for legend states that the great god Rama—whose history is familiar to every village child—came to Malabar Point in the course of his travels, tired and thirsty, and found no water, so he shot an arrow into the sand on the seashore, and water immediately appeared. Passing through narrow streets, lined with tall, quaint houses, painted all colours, the sacred pool is reached. It is situated in the centre of a vast square, entirely surrounded by temples of all sizes and forms—temples shaped like a sugar-loaf, temples with domes, temples with pinnacles and turrets, whose niches are filled with small images. Under the trees are small shrines with pointed roofs; and what Jeremiah the prophet saw and denounced we see around us everywhere: “And they set them up images and groves on every high hill, and under every green tree.” Around the tank are tall white obelisk-shaped pillars, painted in parts red and green, and numerous little altars containing the Tulsi plant. Before the temples are placed—carved in black stone—the Sacred Bull, or Nandi. All proclaim the foul worship against which the Old Testament is one long protest; and whose symbols were the grove, the golden calf, and the brazen serpent. Long flights of steps lead down to the water’s edge, which is some yards below the level of the road. Men and women in clothes of various colours press round the brink of the silent pool: some plunge into, or besprinkle themselves with the sacred liquid; others kneeling on the steps remain in a state of blessed contemplation; all are praying with the utmost fervour. Around the tank on worn and ragged mattresses lie a multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered. A scene rises before us: “Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool; but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me. Jesus said unto him, Rise, take up thy bed and walk; and immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed and walked.” Read in the light of the East, the sacred volume recovers its native colour, and glows with the vigour of new life.

A short walk brings us again to the broad road which runs along the crest of the hill. It is lined with handsome bungalows, with green lawns, and small gardens well kept, with oleander, hibiscus and palms of all varieties. About the end of the ridge, along the brow of a precipitous cliff, are the beautiful grounds of the Ladies' Gymkhana. Sir Henry Yule, in that most delightful work Hobson-Jobson, writes as follows about the word Gymkhana, fast becoming naturalized in England:—

“This word is quite modern, and was unknown twenty-five years ago. It is a fictitious word, invented, we believe, in the Bombay Presidency, and probably based upon “Gend-khana”—ball-house; the name usually given, in Hindu, to an English racket-court. It is applied to a place of public resort at a station, where the needful facilities for athletics and games of all sorts are provided, including—when that was in fashion—a skating-rink, a lawn-tennis ground, and so forth. The ‘gymn’ may be simply a corruption of ‘geno’ shaped by ‘gymnastics.’ The word is also applied to a meeting for such sports; and in this sense it has already travelled to Malta.”

A short distance beyond the Ladies' Gymkhana are the Tulsi Reservoirs and Waterworks, and their situation is exceedingly beautiful. Beneath is a forest of palms, with white houses gleaming among them; and immediately beyond is an azure bay, with a narrow strip of land running into it covered with massive and lofty buildings. In the far distance rise the high peaks and ridges of the volcanic hills of Mahârattâ land, and rocks and islets of fantastic nature stud the great inlet of the sea known as Bombay Harbour. On one side lies this calm, fairy scene; on the other stands out the dull, ugly wall which surrounds the Towers of Silence, where the Parsees deposit their dead, to be devoured by vultures. On the trees and on the walls scores of these hideous birds can be seen. Suddenly they rise in the air: a bier is being brought up the long flight of steps which leads to the hills on which the Towers are situated. Close by the bier are two bearded men, and behind them follow a train of Parsees, dressed in white robes with their clothes linked. At the door of the Towers the relatives leave the body, and it is taken within by the two priests. Inside the large roofless tower are stages, or stories of stone pavement, slanting down to a well, covered with a grating, and on the upper tier are placed, stark naked, the bodies of men; on the second those of women, and on the third those of children. The moment the priests leave the body the vultures swoop down and strip it of every particle of flesh. The skeleton is left for a few days to bleach in the sun and wind till it becomes perfectly dry; then the carriers of the dead, who are a separate class and not allowed to have any social intercourse with other Parsees, come gloved, and with tongs (for a dead body is regarded as an unclean thing) remove the bones and cast them into the well. This mode of disposing of the dead the Parsees have practised from time immemorial. In Grose’s Voyage to the East Indies, printed in 1772, we have a sensational picture of “The Parsee repository for the Dead,” and the following description:

“Eastward of the middle of Malabar Hill stands a stone building, used by the Parsees for depositing their dead, it being
CITIES OF INDIA

Contrary to their religion to bury them. This building is circular, 25 feet in diameter and 12 high, open at the top; in its centre is a well in part grated over, round which is a stone platform, sloping from the sides to the centre. On this platform the dead bodies are exposed to the birds of prey, such as kites and vultures, which are here in great numbers. These immediately seize on the corpse, commonly beginning with the eyes; a man is kept on purpose to observe carefully which eye the bird picks out, and on this they form their conjecture of the state of the soul of the defunct, the right being that which denotes happiness.

"The Parsees believe that any one looking into this building, except the person whose immediate business it is, will in consequence thereof shortly die. I once went up to examine it: a Parsee, in a friendly manner, begged me to desist; assuring me that I should not long survive the gratification of this idle curiosity."

Leaving the Towers of Silence, we descend a steep hill, and a short drive brings us to Breach Candy. At the end of the Breach, or beach—"from the breach of the sea was our sister drowned"—are the temples of Mahaluxmee, almost as sacred as those of Walkeshwar; and beyond them is situated the Vallard, or rampart, built to protect the flat land between the ridges from being flooded at high tide. From Mahaluxmee a road runs along the dreary flats, now being covered with mills and lodging-houses, to the Governor's house at Parelle, which was originally a Portuguese monastery. Fryer mentions, "Parell, where they [the Portuguese] have another Church and Demesnes belonging to the Jesuits." Grose writes: "There are two very pleasant gardens belonging to the Company, cultivated after the European manner; the one a little way out of the gates open to any of the English gentlemen who like to walk there; the other much larger and finer, at about five miles distant from the town, at a place called Parell, where the Governor has a very agreeable country house, which was originally a Roman Chapel belonging to the Jesuits, but confiscated about the year 1719, for some practices against the English interest. It is now converted into a pleasant mansion-house, and what with the additional buildings and improvements of the garden, affords a spacious and commodious habitation.”

Jonathan Duncan, who was a bachelor, lent Parell to James Mackintosh. “We have,” writes Mackintosh to a friend in England, “about five miles of excellent road over a flat from our capital. We inhabit, by the Governor’s kindness, his official country house, a noble building with some magnificent apartments, and with two delightful rooms for my library (overlooking a garden and parkish ground) in which I am now writing.” Seven years Mackintosh loitered away in the magnificent apartments at Parell, reading for the composition of the great works which he never wrote. He read Tiedemann’s Spirit of Speculative Philosophy, and Richardson’s Correspondence, “which contains important materials for literary history.” He was delighted with Cooper’s third volume more than with either of the former. “His mixture of playfulness and tenderness is very bewitching; he is always smiling through his tears.” Thus the weeks and years sped away. He was always sighing for the literary society he had left in London and the “King of Clubs,” and for him, as for Macaulay, neither the land nor the people possessed any real interest. After Mackintosh there came to Parell a man just the reverse of him. Mountstuart Elphinstone was, like Mackintosh, a man of great powers of reasoning, of accomplished learning, but he had what the latter lacked—sustained energies. When engrossed in the multifarious duties attendant on governing a vast province, Mountstuart Elphinstone found time to read Cicero De Claris Oratoribus. “It is not the most brilliant of his works, but still I read it with great pleasure, and discover to myself evident signs of that proficiency which he has attained to cui Cicero valde placebit.” He greatly admires what he has read of Bentham, including half the whole Traités; and he had "finished Clarendon's History, and am going to begin his Life." The study of Manfred led him to Prometheus: "both have sublime passages. I am most struck with those in Æschylus, though, perhaps, the calm grandeur and majesty of Lord Byron's mountains may equal the storms and tempests, the thunders and earthquakes of his rival." Twenty years after Mount-stuart Elphinstone left Bombay, Lady Falkland, who had all the brightness of her mother, Mrs. Jordan, the famous actress, came to reside at Parell; and, being a close observer of nature, she enjoyed the beauty of its grounds. "Near me," she writes, "was the Asoka, which in spring bears beautiful red blossoms; many casuarinas, with their light and graceful foliage, being intermixed and contrasted with the broad leaves of various kinds of palms." A poetic Hindu legend states that the contact of the stem of the asoka with the foot of a beautiful woman makes it blossom.

About two miles from Parell are the Victoria Gardens, which owe their existence to the genius and energy of Sir George Birdwood. He found a swamp, and he drained it, made broad paths and smooth lawns, laid out a garden, and with lavish hand filled it with botanical treasures. Palms of all variety and tropical plants of every kind are, of course, growing there in the greatest luxuriance, but also trees and shrubs gathered from every quarter of the globe seem at home and happy: there is a fine tree with long pinnate foliage covered with yellow and scarlet flowers that came from Africa, its seeds having been found in the Indian Ocean by a sailor who brought them to the Gardens; a bush from Australia, whose leaves glow like gold; and a plant from Brazil, a blaze of crimson blossoms. Around the stem of a stunted palm trails a creeper, a convolvulus, with long blue flowers, very similar to the English flower, which was introduced into Bombay from the Canarese country.

Brighter than the flowers are the Parsee women, with their brilliant-coloured silk robes, which suit their slim, lissom figure. They are talking, gesticulating, and laughing, with olive-complexioned mites with large black eyes and long eyelashes. Hindu women in white robes, and the marigold in their great coils of shiny black hair, are showing the animals to intelligent, bright-looking children, with little, soft, round faces. Men, women, and children all seem amused and happy. It is a pleasure to stroll about the grounds, all fragrance and flowers, and note the gentleness, the attention, and polished behaviour which marks a people whose manners are some thousand years old.

Life in India is a life of startling contrasts. A broad, dusty road leads us from the Victoria Gardens to the Byculla Club, one of the most famous and comfortable clubs in the East, and we are transplanted into London life. A group of men are sitting in the large and airy verandah, discussing the last news from England, the infinite sins of Mr. Gladstone, and then, naturally, modern democracy. There is not unanimity, however. An ex-Cabinet Minister who, like Ulysses, "has been in many cities, and knows the thoughts of many men," warmly defends his old chief, and he vigorously tilts against the pet prejudices of the Anglo-Indian official. He has studied Indian problems in blue-books, and the men around him have devoted their lives to solving them. They have the advantage of experience; he has the advantage of regarding them from the wider and more intellectual atmosphere of European statesmanship.

But we must not loiter long at Byculla, for we have to dine in the Fort. We leave London club life, and plunge into the native city, a paradise of luxury and splendour, stench and squalor. The richness and variety of the outlines of the narrow and curving, but not crooked streets, take hold of the imagination. The many-tinted houses, the colours white, yellow, and red, the luxurious or wild carving lavished on the pillars of wood, the balconies, rosettes of the windows, and the architraves of the roofs, give an air of refinement, of subtle grace which defies description or criticism. The Hindu temple with its gaudy-coloured mythological subjects, and the Mussulmans' simple white mosque, are vividly contrasted. It is a world of wonder. Here all races have met: Persians in huge shaggy hats, and British sailors in white; the strong, lithe, coal-black Afreede seaman, tall martial Rajpoots, peaceful Parsees in cherry-coloured silk trousers, Chinamen with the traditional pig-tail, swaggering Mussulmans in turbans of green, sleek Marwarees with high-fitting parti-coloured turbans of red and yellow. This tide of human life rolls down the centre of the street, unruffled by the vehicles from all quarters of the earth ploughing their way through it. There is the tramcar from New York drawn by walers from Australia, with pith helmets to protect them from the rays of the sun; the phaeton from Long Acre drawn by high-stepping Arabs; the rude vehicle of the land, innocent of springs, with a single square seat, drawn by handsome sleek bullocks. With much trouble and much shouting the driver works his way through the enchanted street, and we see the immortal eunuch, the porter, and the veiled lady standing near a shop filled with gold and silver stuff. Each trade has its own locale, as it was in the days when "Zedekiah the king commanded that they should commit Jeremia into the court of the prison, and that they should give him daily a piece of bread out of the bakers' street." There are rows of bakers' shops, with large ovens, and vast round loaves of unleavened bread. These are long lines of confectioners', in which the sweetmeats are piled up in all sorts of fantastic shapes, and behind his pile sits the fat, greasy, half-naked confectioner. Then come the shops of the buniás, which are crowded with baskets filled with pulse and grain; and the Oriental grocer kindly chatters to three or four women as he weighs their flour in a pair of primitive scales, and after much bargaining

they purchase for a farthing a lump of salt and two green chillies, which are their sole luxuries in life. Long and sharp is the ting-ting that proceeds from the shops where Javan, Tubal, and Meshech trade "their vessels of brass in thy market." They are filled from floor to roof with large pots and small pots; for as the Hindu eats and drinks only from vessels made of brass, the brazier's art is an important one in the land. There are the shops of the money-changers, who are seated square-legged on their carpet, with heaps of rupees and shells before them. In a small hovel is a lean old man who, with a blowpipe and small hammer and a pair of pincers, is manufacturing "the chains and the bracelets, the ear-rings, the rings and the nose jewels." Sable eve spreads swiftly, and the great brass lamps hanging from the roof are lighted, and the earthenware cressets before the dark shrines are illuminated. As we lift up our faces to the richly carved balconies, one blaze of light, we see what Jehu saw as he entered in at the gate—"Jezebel, who painted her face and tired her hair, and looked out of a window."

The dawn had hardly broken in the East when we went on board a small yacht to sail to Elephanta. After a couple of hours' sail the landing-place at Elephanta is reached. Here, in the days of old, there used to be a colossal stone elephant, from which the Portuguese named the place. After ascending the steep path, and a steeper flight of stairs, we find ourselves on a small plateau, and before us opens a wide cavern. We enter, and when the eye becomes accustomed to the darkness we see before us a gigantic trīmurītī, or three-formed god. The expression of the first face is one of far-off, deep contemplation, and is grand and noble in its calm serenity. It represents Shiv in the character of Brahma, the creator; in his left hand he holds a citron, an emblem of the womb. The right hand is broken. The breast is adorned with a necklace of pearls, and below it is a deep, richly-wrought heart ornament. The head-dress consists of the hair raised and crowned by a royal tiara most beautifully carved. The face to the east, with its stern, commanding, Roman expression, is Shiv in the character of Buddha, the destroyer, and the brow has an oval swelling above the nose, representing a third eye. He is smiling at a cobra, which is twisted round his arms, and with stretched hood looks him in the face. Among his ornaments are some of the peculiar symbols of Shiv—a human skull over the temple, a leaf of the Gloriosa superba, a branch of the milk bush, twisted snakes instead of hair, and high up a cobra erect with outstretched hood. To the west there is a gentle, placid face, which is Shiv in the character of Vishnu the preserver, and he holds a lotus flower in his hand. The Trimurti is the main object of interest in the cavern, but many hours can be profitably spent in examining the different compartments, with their sculptures full of power and life, representing the gods and goddesses of the Hindu Pantheon, and the stories of their lives. Shiv, with his consort Parvati, is a favourite subject. In one compartment we have Shiv and Parvati seated on the holy hill of Kailas; and Parvati being in a pet, or mana, has her head slightly turned away. Legend says that the demon Ravan chanced to pass by at the time, and being angry at the hill stepping his progress, took it in his arms and shook it. Parvati, feeling the hill to move, ran for protection to Shiv's arms. One story states that Shiv in his rage stamped Ravan under foot; another (probably more true) that he blessed him for stopping Parvati's fit of ill temper. Behind Parvati is the figure of a nurse executed with great spirit, and she carries a child astraddle on her left hip, as carried in India at the present hour. These sculptures illustrate how unbroken in the East are the links between the past and the present; they are an epitome of the religious and social life that makes the continent of India so deeply interesting. The gross and passionate effigies of Hindu Mythology completely express the Oriental mind—"humorous, amorous, obscene, subtle, and refined,"

SURAT

For all travellers who take an interest in the history of the rise of British dominion in India, their first point of stoppage after leaving Bombay should be Surat. It was at the port of Surat that English enterprise, after roaming over the Indian seas, first furled its wandering sail and there established a small factory which proved to be the foundation by an English trading company of a great Oriental Empire. The province of Gujarat, of which Surat is one of the chief towns, has, on account of its natural advantages for both agriculture and commerce, from the earliest times occupied an important position in the history of Hindustan. “Goozerat,” says a renowned Italian traveller, “is a great kingdom. The people are idolaters, and have a peculiar language and a king of their own, and are tributary to no one.” According to the permanent boundaries indicated by natural formation, and the language of the people, Gujarat is about equal to Great Britain in extent, and somewhat resembles a horseshoe in shape. The Gulf of Cambay forms its inner boundary, and Surat is one of its most ancient ports in that part of the coast; how ancient it is impossible to decide, for on that point the historians are not in accord. Local traditions, however, are agreed in fixing the establishment of Surat as a modern city in the last year of the fifteenth century, and in 1514 the Portuguese traveller, Barbosa, describes it as "a city of very great trade in all classes of merchandize, a very important seaport, yielding a large revenue to the king, and frequented by many ships from Malabar and all parts." Barbosa's own countrymen were, however, for many years the greatest enemies to the growth of the prosperity of the town. Two years before his visit they had burnt it, and subsequently in 1530 and 1531 they again laid waste the city. In order to protect it from their frequent attacks, the King of Ahmedabad commanded the present castle to be built, and, in spite of the efforts of the Portuguese, who tried by force and bribery to prevent its construction, the fortress was finished about 1546.

In 1572 the fertile fields and park-like lands of Gujarat attracted the attention of the great Akbar, and he appeared with overwhelming forces and received the submission of the province. For nearly two centuries after this, Gujarat continued to be one of the provinces subject to the house of Tamerlane, and Surat was ruled by Governors appointed by the Emperors of Delhi. Akbar, always willing to encourage foreign enterprise, concluded a treaty with the Portuguese, which made them virtual masters of the Surat seas. The example set by Portugal was not lost upon the other nations of Europe. The Dutch began to turn their attention to the Eastern trade, and rapidly to supplant the merchants of Lisbon. The great Elizabethan mariners took up the tale, and the first Charter of the "Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading with the East Indies," which, after various renewals, amalgamations, and changes of title, retained through all its vicissitudes a traditional identity, was granted on December 31, 1600. In 1608, or just about a century after the arrival of the Portuguese, Captain Hawkins of the good ship Hector brought to anchor the first English vessel in Gujarát waters. He tells us that he was kindly received by the natives "after their own barbarous manner," but was much harassed by the Portuguese. At this time, Surat is described as of considerable size, "with many good houses belonging to merchants," and "a pleasant Green having a Maypole in the middle on which at high festivals were hung lights and other decorations." The city was very populous and full of merchants. The people were "tall, neat, and well clothed in garments of white calico and silk, and very grave and judicious in their behaviour."

Before the English could trade a reference had to be made to the Viceroy of Gujarat (then at Cambay) and upon a favourable reply goods were sold and purchased. Hawkins, who had a letter from James I to the Emperor Jehangir, set out for the Moghul Court, and William Finch, with three or four English domestics, was left at Surat "to sell the remainder of the goods that had been landed." Hawkins met the Emperor, and married "a whyte mayden out of his palace," but he could succeed only in obtaining the verbal assurance of Jehangir that his countrymen would find protection, but no formal engagement. The Portuguese continued to harass them, and the coast in the neighbourhood witnessed many hard-contested struggles before the English were permitted to share in the lucrative trade of the city.

In September, 1611, Sir Henry Middleton arrived with his three ships at Surat. The local authorities however refused to allow him to trade, and Middleton, leaving the port, retaliated upon the Surat traders in the Red Sea. He captured "the great Pilgrim ship, the Rehemy, of Surat." She was of 1,500 tons, had on board, it is said, 1,500 souls, and belonged to the Moghul's mother, whose devotion had built and maintained this ship for the accommodation of pilgrims to Mecca, most of whom, as in all the other ships, "carried adventures of traders." In September, 1612, that goodly seaman, Captain Best, reached the coast with his two ships, the Dragon and Hosander, and the local authorities, having the fear of God instilled into them by Middleton, concluded with him a trading agreement. On November 29, the Portuguese fleet, consisting of four galleons and more than twenty frigates, appeared off the bar of Surat to drive the two English ships away. Three stubborn fights ensued. Then Best determined to fight them in an open sea, and, crossing the gulf, anchored at a bay where the Moghul troops were besieging a fort. On December 22 the four Portuguese galleons appeared, and at night anchored within shot. "Early in the morning Captain Best stood towards them, who weighed and put before the wind, cannonaded until out of reach, for they sailed better. The next morning, at sunrise, he stood to them again, and maintained the fight until noon, when both sides weary (such is the phrase) parted." ¹ On the 27th Best's two ships, "no longer dogged by the Portuguese, anchored at Swally and resumed the intercourse with their factors at Surat, where the event of their fights raised the English reputation even in the opinion of ill-will." The trading agreement had been confirmed by an Imperial Firman or decree. The Governor sent it to Swally as a common letter of business, but Best refused to receive it unless delivered with the usual solemnities. "This spirit brought the Governor and his son-in-law, the custom-master, to Swally, who presented it in state and congratulated: but were very curious to know whether the English ships had not suffered more than was said, in the late engagement." From this Firman dates the foundation of our power in India. And "this spirit" has made it extend from Surat to Attock.

Two years later that stern and experienced seaman,

Nicholas Downton, with a fleet of fine ships—the Merchant’s Hope (200 tons), Hector (300 tons), The New Year’s Gift (600 tons), and Solomon (of 500 tons), came to anchor in South Swally—“God be thanked, in safety, having lost in the ship the Solomon, till then since our departure from England, only one man.” Downton learnt the next day that the Great Moghul had debarked the Portuguese from trade in any of his dominions “by reason of a ship they took at the bar’s foot of Surratt of very great value pertaining to his subjects, as also had besieged a town possessed by them some twelve leagues to the southward of Surratt called Damon [Daman] which siege as yet continueth, though with little hope of prevailing.” The Governor pressed him that he should go and aid them in the siege of Daman, but Downton refused. However, having “somewhat (as we thought) mollified the Governor,” they began to discharge their goods about the primes of November. In December Downton heard that the Viceroy of Goa was equipping a great force against him. On January 18 “came to the bar of Surratt the Viceroy of Portugal—with six galleons from 800 to 1,000 tons, three smaller ships from 150 to 300 tons, two galleys and some 60 frigates.”¹ Don Jeronimo de Azevedo, the Viceroy, hoisted his flag as Admiral on board the Todos Santos, of 800 tons. The Portuguese fleet carried two hundred and thirty-five guns. The European soldiers and sailors amounted to two thousand six hundred, the native sailors to six thousand. The four English ships carried only eighty guns of inferior calibre, and their soldiers and sailors amounted to four hundred men. But Downton was an excellent bold seaman. On the 20th three of the smaller Portuguese vessels with many of their frigates came within the sands at Swally. Downton weighed from “our usual road,” and going near the entrance “the General sent the Hope a distance from us to give an edge to their courage whereby to have some rash attempt practised by them, which fell out accordingly."¹ The three smaller vessels and most of their frigates attacked the Hope "and with great resolution came aboard her and once or twice entered her." The other English ships went to her rescue and were attacked by the rest of the frigates. But they repulsed them and so galled the three ships with their fire that those on board had to forsake them "and enter their frigates for quicker speed to be gone." "But their haste was to their ruin, and their speed their overthrow, for we let fly at them with our great ordnance and small shot, so that by them many of their frigates were sunk and their inhabitants lost their lives. Till sunset we continually battered one against the other." In the meantime the Hope cleared herself "and doubting what traitors might be left aboard the Portugal ships thought it the best course to fire them, which accordingly they did." The English loss was five men slain and divers wounded, "which number (thanks be to God) was far inferior to the enemy's loss." The Shahbandar, or Marine Superintendent of the Surat port, stated that the Portuguese carried to Daman to be buried 360, "besides divers that we saw daily floating on the water and lying on the sand." The mainmast of the Hope had been burnt, and Downton was unable to break the blockade and attack the Portuguese outside the bar. But each morning and evening he fired across the strip of sand a volley at the enemy, aiming his best cannon at the Viceroy's prow—"which I did to try his best temper."

The Portuñese, having lost three ships, got within ten days three more from their settlements at Daman and Diu—"after whose arrival, to weary our men and keep them in action, they made many shows and provers to come in fire boats chained and stuffed with powder, wildfire, and other combustible matters down on the English

ships. “One whereof came aboard the Hope, but, God be thanked, cleared herself without hurt and so burning drame by her.” The next night at the same time they exercised he like with two very dangerous fires. The first contained two boats and the next four, which were all chained together, fired and let drive amongst us; but putting our ships under sail we cleared us of them, which drove ashore and there burnt out.” The Viceroy, seeing that their force and stratagems took no better effect, “the next day, with his whole fleet, set sail and went and rode at the bar, from whence the day following they all departed, but whither not yet certainly known; we daily expected their return hither again or encounter at sea, where it may be they lie in wait for us, wherein God’s will be done.”

In August 1615 Sir Thomas Roe, sent by James I as Ambassador to the Court of the Moghul, arrived at Surat.
It was a critical moment. He found his countrymen oppressed and treated with severity. As he relates in his diary:

“Soo base are our Conditions in this Port and subject to soe many slaueryes, such as noe free hart can endure, that I doe resolue eyther to establish a trade on free Conditions or to doey my best to dissolue yt. For noe profit can be a good dayes before leave can be had for any man to passe the riuier; a poore bottle of wyne sent to the sick deteyned; and every trifle ransacked and taken away, with unsufferable insolencies."

Roe held a high estimate of the nature of his appointment. When the Surat authorities suggested that his company might be searched "according to the custome of the country," we find him protesting

"that I was the Ambassador of a mightie and free Prince: that I would neuer dishonnor my Master so much, whose Person I bare, as to subject myselfe to so much slauery."

Roe's tact, dignity and energy won the day, and three years later he succeeded in obtaining certain further privileges for his countrymen. He also made a separate treaty with the Moghul Emperor's third son, Prince Kharram, afterwards the famous Shah Jehan, to whom had been assigned by his father the Government of Surat. By this treaty the English gained the rights of building a house, bearing arms, exercising their own religion freely, and settling their own disputes among themselves. The modest house at Surat was the first permanent connexion of the English with India, and the growth of the Surat Factory forms an important and interesting chapter in the history of our Indian Empire.

Twelve years after the English got permission to build a house; the President received the high-sounding title of Chief of the Honourable Company of English Merchants trading in the East. The Portuguese did their utmost to use their influence with the Moghul to expel the Dutch and English from his dominions. In a letter dated October 25, 1630, we have a graphic description of a stubborn engagement with the Portuguese. After a sketch of the formation of the troops we are informed:—

"But such was the undauntednes of our English, being stirred up to a high measure of furie by the hourly vexations and braveings of the enemy, as being now come within shot with a generall resolution rejoicing att the occasion, after a shot or two received first from the Portuigalls pushed on in the verye face and mouth of all their friggats and perceiving that but 3 of them could use the advantage of their prowes against them, and that some of the rest were brought aground, and had only their Harquibuses arocrooke to gall them advanced forwards still plying their small shot with very good discipline, and the Portuigalls noe lesse valliently replying with their double forces, as well from their friggats at sea, as the squadrone on shore, but not able it seems to endured the obstinate rage of our people they began to give grounds, and our most fiercely following, entered pellmell amongst them, even into the water, within lesse then pistoll shot of their friggats; in which intrim the Vice Kings sonne was conveyed aboard but soe narrowly escaped that the party who provided for his safety was himselfe taken prisoner in the accon [action]: many of the English not feareng to runn up to the chin in water, even to the very sides of their friggats pursuing the victory with great slaughter both at shoare and at sea, and at length returned with 27 Portuigalls prisoners taken alive, without the losse of any more than one ancient man (a corporall), not wounded but suffocated only with heat, and the wounding of 7 more of our people. This they happily performed in sight of Merza Baker, and divers of these country people to their great admiration and our nations greater honour, to that good God that led them by the hand be the glorye."

To revenge his defeat the Portuguese Admiral made an effort to destroy the English ships, which proved disastrous to his own fleet. The President writes in the postscript to his letter:

"At this very instant is come newes from ye Commanders below that the last night (being Sunday againe) about 8 of the clock, the Portuigalls put in execution their maine stratagem soe much depended on by them, and not without cause much feared by us, in freeing of their 4 prepared vessells chained together for the intended destruction of our fleet, but the vigi-

The factory was fortified in 1642, and in 1646 its "quick stock" was valued at £83,000, and twenty years later it is said to have excelled all houses, except that of the Dutch, who had also been allowed to establish a factory. But though their factory had grown in wealth, the English factors had much to endure in the early days. In 1662 they state that "our last year's imprisonment and restraynt from food, the attempt of our deaths with many other sordid abuses, cryes vengeance on these infidels. And because our complainnts at home for justice cannot be heard, therefore are wee ye scorne of those people and our privelidges and honour trampled under by force in ye absence of our shipping." A more prosperous time however ensued when the brave and energetic Sir George Oxinden, who deserves to rank with Clive and Hastings as one of the illustrious founders of our Indian Empire, became chief of the factory. His defence of the factory when Shivaji, the founder of the Mahratta Empire, betrayed the town, was as gallant an affair as Clive's defence of Arcot. He informed the company in London that

"on ye 6th January, 1664, was brought a hott allarum yt Sevagy ye grand rebell of ye Deccan was within 10 or 15 miles of ye towne. The President sent for forty men from the ships to aid him in the defence, with whom wee your Ffactors servants joined and having drawn them out in ranke and file with drum and trumpett your President in the head marcht through ye body of ye towne to ye Greene before ye Castle where ye Governour was ready to pop in upon the first notice of their approach. Wee past close by him, and so marcht on taking a great circle round that ye enemy was at the gates before wee could reach our house."

A Mr. Anthony Smith coming from Swalley was taken prisoner and came to Shivaji, who took 300 rupees "ransome of him, and sent him ye next day to menace us, but before that we had received many threats. But wee still bidd him keepe his people out of ye reach of our gunns, elec wee would shoote them. Hee returned answere wee were friends, wee replied if soe, why did hee detaine an English man, take a horse out of our stable and make fences of your goods yt lay before ye coustume house; and also suffered them to bee plundered; all these things spoake him an ennemy, and therefore this President returned answere wee would not trust him or admitt of any further treaty, and therefore hee should send us noe more messages, and if hee did wee would kill ye messenger."

Shivaji also sent messengers to demand homage

"and yt if we refused it hee would raise our house to ye ground, and not spare a life.

"Wee replied wee were here on purpose to maintaine your house to ye death of ye last man and therefore not to delay his coming upon us; by ye time he had broken Hodjy Saed Beagues house open, and had one nightes entire plunder out of it, which being so very neare us, as one wall to part both houses, wee feared they would strengthen yt place and afterwards annoy us, and by their multitudes force their way or undermine and blow us up, and yt seeing they did begin with their horse and foote to sur-round us, some then standing under our caves for noe good, wee caused a party of foote to sally forth ye house and fight them; in which scufell we had 3 men slightly wounded, ours sleu a horse and man, some say two or three, but wee routed them. This good success animated us yet further to clear our quarters of them, and hearing they had taken their randevous in a Muskett or Moore Church joining close to our house, and also in Hodgy Saedd house warehouses, having out of feare of us not done him ye quarter of ye mischiefe they intended him. Whilst our men were clearing ye Muskett they in ye houses and warehouses opened ye doores and fled, soe wee shutt up ye doores and barea-cadoed them, and made a passage from our into his house, and kept a garrison in a belcony that cleared all ye streat and garded ye other house of ye Hodgies. When ye rebell had heard what was past of ye killing and routing his guards hee falls a threatening Mr. Smith, some time with ye loss of his head and some times to cutt of his hand, & at last causes him to write a noate to ye President, that if wee persisted in fighting against him hee would race our house to ye ground and bee our destruction. By this time wee had more assistance from ye ships, wherfore ye President wrote Mr. Smith, we would prosecute wt wee had begun, and not at all moved at his threate requiring him to save the labour of his servants running to and fro on messages, and come himself with all his army."

The approach of the Moghul army caused Shivaji to return from the town which he had plundered and laid waste.

"He hath carried away in gold, silver, and pearle, precious stones and other rich good to the value of many hundred thousand pounds, and burnt of other goods and houses to ye amount of as much more, so yt ye towne is utterly ruin'd and very little left either of riches or habitation. Ye rogue was very cruel; Mr. Smith in ye time of his imprisonment was present when hee cutt of more than 26 hands in one day and many heads; who ever hee was yt was taken and brought before him yt could not redeeme himself lost either his hand or his head, and his manner was first to plunder and then to cause ye owner of his house to give him some thing over and above to redeeme his house from being burnt, and yet ye perfidious villaine would fire it afterwards, although hee had obliged himself to ye contrary. Wee are now endeavouring to emprove this skirmage of ours to your profitt, by acclamations of ye towns people, as well they yt are sufferers as those whose houses were preserv'd, who laying aside their owne losses cry out in thousands for a reward from ye King to ye English yt had by their courage preserved them, when those to whom they were intrusted as the Governor etc a dared not shew his head."

On the arrival of the Moghul army Sir George Oxenden received from the Commander

"great thanks for ye good service we did ye king and the country; whereupon your President having a pistoll in his hand layed it before ye Chiefe saying yt hee did now lay down his armes, leaving ye future care and protection of ye citie to them, which was exceedingly well taken; telling ye President hee did accept it and in reward of ye good service hee must give him a vest, a horse, and girt a sword about him; but your President told him these were things becoming a souldier, but we were merchants, and expected favour from ye King in our trade." ¹

The prosperity of the factory at Surat received a fatal blow by Bombay being ceded to the Company (1668) and being made the capital of the Company's possessions and the chief seat of their trade (1687). Surat was taken possession of by the English two years after the battle of Plassey (1757), and the conquerors assumed the undivided government of the city in 1800.

By means of old records and books of travel we gain an insight into the internal economy of the factory, and catch some interesting glimpses of the habits and life of the English in Surat in those days. John Fryer, M.D., Cantabrig., and Fellow of the Royal Society, writes from Surat, January 15, 1674-5: "The House the English live in at Surat is partly the King's Gift, partly hired; Built of stone and excellent Timber, with good Carving without Representations; very strong, for that each Floor is Half a Yard thick at least, of the best plastered Cement, which is very weighty. It is contrived after the Moor's Buildings, with upper and lower Galleries, or Terras-walks; a neat Oratory, a convenient open Place for Meals. The President has spacious Lodgings, noble Rooms for Counsel and Entertainment, pleasant Tanks, Yards, and an Hummmum to wash in; but no Gardens in the City, or very few, though without they have many, like Wildernesses, overspread with Trees. The English had a neat one, but Seva Gi's coming destroyed it: It is known, as the other Factories are, by their several Flags flying."

CITIES OF INDIA

The neat Oratory was the first place of worship founded by the English in India. Ten years before Fryer's visit George Oxinden informed the Company that they had

"seperated a place apart for Gods worship and decently adorned it, wherein stands your Library, and amongst them those several volumes of ye holy bible in ye Languages which is much esteemed by those yt are learned amongst these people: yt if any eminent person come to your houses his greatest desire is to see the Chappell; wherfore wee entreate you for further ornament, to send us out a large table in a frame, gilded and handsomely adorned with Moses and Aaron holding the two tables containing the ten Commandments, the Lords Prayer and the Creed, written in letters of gould, and in ye midst at ye topp in triangles, Gods name writ in as many of these easterne Languages as Arabick, Persian, &c: as can be procured; which if you please to honor our Chappell with, it will bee a glory to our religion, as yt which is more taken than anything that they shall read beside, and yet our meaning is yt ye Commandments &c be wrot in ye English language." ¹

In the convenient place for meals the factors fared sumptuously every day. Their dishes and plates were of silver, "many and substantial," and were filled with the choicest viands prepared to please every palate by English, Portuguese, and French cooks. At dinner each course was ushered in by the sound of trumpets, and a band of music played during the meal. The English factors, even in those early days, had a sound knowledge of native character, and knew how to impress the Oriental mind. We are told that from the very outset the President adopted considerable show. When he went into the streets, "besides a noise of trumpets, there was a guard of English soldiers, consisting of a double ile led by a sergeant, a body of forty moormen and a flagman carrying St. George's colours swallow-tailed in silk fastened to a single partizan.” The President was carried in a Palki emblazoned with the royal escutcheon and lined with rich silks, and his Council were “in large coaches drawn by stately oxen.” Fryer gives us a sketch of the native coach in which the factors rode. He was one of the old travellers who describes things as exactly as they see them, and this is the virtue which causes them to defy the power of oblivion. The works of Bernier, Tavernier, Terry, Hamilton, and Fryer, though two centuries have lapsed since they were first printed, still contain the most accurate and graphic accounts of India that have ever been published. These men were shrewd observers, and they note with care the physical appearance of the land through which they pass, the customs of the people, the hovels of the poor, and the palaces of the great. By simple speech they make us their companions in their wanderings. The modern traveller discusses the ryotwari system and the salt tax. Fryer tells us that the “Combies till the land and dress the corn with no remarkable difference from other Nations, they plough with Oxen, their coulters unarmed mostly, Iron being scarce, but they have hard wood which will turn their light grounds.” “Their oxen are Little but all have a Bunch on their neck,” “the women are Neat, well shaped and Affectionate to their children, Bearing them Naked on their Hips astraddle.” By these touches he brings to our eyes and minds the ordinary life of the changeless East. His little sketch of the coach carries us into the very heart of a daily scene.

"Two large Milk-white Oxen are putting in to draw it, with circling Horns as black as a Coal, each Point tipped with Brass, from whence come Brass Chains across to the Headstall, which is all of Scarlet, and a Scarlet Collar to each, of Brass Bells, about their Necks, their flapping Ears snipped with Art, and from their Nostrils Bridles covered with Scarlet. The Chariot itself is no swinging like ours, but fastened to the main Axle by neat Arche which support a Foursquare Seat, which is inlaid with Ivory or enriched as they please; at every Corner are turned Pillars which make (by twisted Silk or Cotton Cords) the Sides and support the Roof, covered with English Scarlet Cloth, and lined with Silk with Party-coloured Borders; in these they spread Carpets, and lay Bolsters to ride cross-legged, sometimes three or four in one: It is born on two Wheels only, such little ones as our Fore-wheels are, and pinned on with a Wooden Arch, which serves to mount them: The Charioteer rides before, a-straddle on the Beam that makes the Yoke for the Oxen, which is covered with Scarlet, and finely carved underneath; he carries a Goad instead of a Whip: In Winter (when they rarely stir) they have a mumjuma, or Wax-cloth to throw over it. Those for Journeying are something stronger than those for the Merchants to ride about the City or to take the Air on; which with their nimble Oxen they will, when they meet in the Fields, run Races on, and contend for the Garland as much as for an Olympick Prize; which is a Diversion, To see a Cow gallop, as we say in scorn; but these not only pluck up their Heels apace, but are taught to amble, they often riding on them."

The merchants at home did not approve of the ostentation of their servants. They told the President that they would be better pleased if he would suppress his rising ambition and modify his inordinate love of display; and to enable him the more readily to renounce all pomps and vanities they ordered that he should only be styled Agent, and reduced his salary to £300 a year. When Surat was taken possession of by the English in 1759 the commercial period came to an end. Fifty years went on, and when the East India Company assumed the entire government of the city and its dependencies, the Chiefship and Council were abolished, and a Lieutenant-Governor of the Castle was appointed. Three years later the title was changed into "Agent of Government at Surat." Surat, from being the seat of power and government, became a mere district of Bombay. The old factory, the scene of so much revelry and splendour, was converted into a lunatic asylum and a refuge for the native sick. Briggs, the author of Cities of Gujarashtra, who visited Surat in 1847, speaks of it as "a noble pile." "Lusty timbers of huge dimensions, and walls intended to last as long as any of those of 'the old houses at home,' barred windows below and heavy gates without, tell of other and glorious times." Thirty years ago, when we first visited Surat, what was left of the old factory was only a portion of the original lodge, which had been converted into a private dwelling. The fragment, however, deserves to be maintained with pious care by the State as one of the most interesting relics of our race. The factory at Surat in less than a century expanded into an empire which in extent of territory and in multitude of subjects rivalled Rome.

Leaving the English factory and proceeding to the north, we came to an open plot of ground with a cross which marked the site of the altar of the chapel of the Capuchins, who for a century, according to Hamilton in A New Account of the East Indies (1700–1720), "practised surgery gratis to the poor Natives of what Persuasion soever." Close to the church was the French lodge, of which only the lines of the foundations remain. Behind the French lodge are a few rooms of the Portuguese factory, "a fortification built for a never waning dominion; strong, durable, impregnable to the native host: a receptacle for the pomp and pageantry of life."

The sepulchral ruins in the cemetery of Surat, massive and ponderous in their elaborate masonry, are all that is now left to remind the traveller of the pomp and show of former days. The old factors were of the same mind as poor Cleopatra:

"Let's do it after the high Roman fashion, And make Death proud to take us."

The most stately monument is that erected over those "most brotherly of brothers, Christopher and Sir George
CITIES OF INDIA

Oxinden." There is no weak affectation or sentimentalism in George Oxinden's tomb; but it is worthy of the man who, with a handful of Europeans, held his factory against the whole Mahratta army. It is forty feet in height and twenty-five in diameter, and includes two domes, with staircases and galleries, supported on massive pillars. It appears from he Latin inscription that the lower dome was first built to commemorate Sir George’s brother Christopher, and was surmounted by one to commemorate himself. Christopher’s epitaph has too much of the ledger about it to please. It laments his short life, for it was only possible to reckon his days, and not his years, before death required the account. “Do you ask, my masters, what is your profit and loss? You have gained sorrow, but he has lost his life; _per contra_ let him write, ‘Death to me is gain.’” We may quote one more from the many quaint epitaphs to be found in the Surat cemetery:

“In memory of Mary Price, wife of William Andrew Price, Esq., Chief for affairs of the British nation and Governor of the Moghul’s Castle and Fleet of Surat, who, through the spotted veil of the small pox, rendered a pure and unspotted soul to God, expecting but not fearing death which ended her days. April the thirteenth, Anno Domini 1761. _Actis suae_ 23.

‘The virtues which in her short life were shown Have equalled been by few, surpassed by none.’”

From the English cemetery we pass over, as Fryer did, to the Dutch tombs, “many and handsome, most of them Pargetted.” They stand in a neglected patch of ground studded with fruit-trees, and some wild parasite is bursting asunder their walls. “Grand, noble, for the expanse of ground it covers, its height, its peculiar style of sculpture is the mausoleum erected over the last resting-place of Mr. Van Rheede, to whom Oriental history pays the tribute of eulogy in denominating the _Maecenas of Malabar._ At a period when European residents in India wholly directed their attention to mercantile adventure, or attempted political aggrandizement, he could spare the leisure to devote to scientific research; and his labours have provided Holland with many valuable manuscripts and other equally important curiosities, while some of his statements still challenge enquiry. His _Hortus Indicus Malabaricus_, a work in twelve volumes folio, is an evidence of his literary exertions.” The tomb approaches in shape a decagon with a double cupola of great dimensions and a gallery above and below supported on handsome columns. “In the centre of the chamber a single tombstone marks a vault with more occupants than the Dutch officials.” A wooden tablet recounts the particulars of “Hendrik Adriaan Baron Van Reede,” who died, aged 56, on the 15th of December, 1691.
“The noble pile,” as Ovington calls it, was built to eclipse that of Sir George Oxinden’s. Nothing now remains to remind the traveller of the “one-hundred-and-seventy fortified stations in this India,” which the Dutch once held, except a few ruined bastions of their old forts, the massive tombs in the old cemeteries dotted about the coast, and a few volumes of Dutch records in the archives at Madras and Bombay.
AHMEDABAD

To the traveller, Ahmedabad, the capital of Gujarat will always be a city of interest as containing some of the most perfect and the most characteristic forms which Saracenic architecture assumed in India. It has also a history which has an interest, studied on the spot, among the monuments of the city. The province of Gujarat was for centuries the seat of very flourishing Hindu dynasties, and the story of their rise and fall is being traced by European and native scholars (with their newly created respect for historical accuracy) from inscriptions engraved on sheets of copper, on coins, and carved on stones. These have been compelled to yield up the secrets which literature disdained to preserve. The Hindu writers, who in ancient days wrote historical legends, inform us that Vama Raja, in the eighth century, about the time the Mercians were conquering Wessex, founded the Chavada dynasty and built the famous capital Anahelavada,¹ about sixty miles north-east of Ahmedabad on the limpid stream of the Saravasti. It was his minister who erected the renowned town of Champanir, thirty miles from Baroda. The house of Vama Raja reigned over Gujarat for upwards of a century. It was succeeded by the Solanki family, whose greatness was founded by Mula Raja, said by an illustrious sage to be "the benefactor of the world. He was generous-minded, full of all good qualities. All kings worshipped him

as they worshipped the sun, all subjects who abandoned their own country found a happy residence under his protection." Mula Raja was succeeded by his son, Chāmunda (A.D. 997), and during his reign Mahmud of Ghazni burst into India, penetrated into Gujarat, and took the capital Anahelavada. He then attacked the far-famed temple of Somnath, desecrated the beloved Pagan shrine, and stripped it of its treasures. The story of Mahmud striking the idol of Somnath with his mace and the jewels running out is however one of the mock pearls of history. The real object of worship at Somnath was not an image but a simple cylinder of stone—a lingam. It is described as five cubits high, two of which were set in the ground, and it was destroyed by a fire lighted round it to split the hardness of the stone. For a year Mahmud of Ghazni lingered in Gujarat, delighted with the garden of Western India; and its broad fertile plains, adorned with magnificent trees, were so great a contrast to his rocky and barren home that he entertained the thought of settling there, but on mature deliberation determined to return to his own dominions. His invasion was but a passing inroad. After he left, Gujarat enjoyed many years of peace and prosperity, and the splendour of its capital increased. It was during the reign of Sidh Raja the Magnificent that the province reached the zenith of its glory. Then Anahelavada was said to be the richest town in India, and marvellous stories are told of its markets, its palaces, its schools, and its gardens, where, amidst sweet-scented trees, the learned studied and taught philosophy and religion. Sidh Raja ranks high among Hindu monarchs and he is described by his chroniclers as "the ornament of Goojat-land." Of his character we are told that he was "the receptacle of all good qualities, as great in kind actions as he was in war; the tree of deserts to his servants." Sidh Raja reigned for forty-nine years (A.D. 1094–1143), and on his death, as he left no son, the throne passed to a distant relative. The last of the line was Bhima Deva, who repelled an invasion made by Muhammad Ghori, but Kulub-ud-din, a favourite Turkish slave, revenged his master’s defeat by driving Bhima Deva from his capital. The Muhammadans however did not remain in Gujarat, and Anahelavada continued to be the capital of a Hindu kingdom.

It was not till a century later that Gujarat was conquered by the Muslims and passed under the rule of the Viceroy of the Emperor of Delhi. These Viceroy in course of time grew more and more powerful and Gujarat became the seat of an independent Muhammadan dynasty. The second Sultan of this house, Ahmed Shah, founded in 1411 the capital Ahmedabad on the banks of the Saburmati and on the site of several Hindu towns. He built a citadel of much strength and beauty and he laid out his city in broad, fair streets. Bringing marble and other rich building materials from a long distance he raised magnificent mosques, palaces and tombs, and by encouraging merchants, weavers and skilled craftsmen he made Ahmedabad a centre of trade and manufacture. Under able rulers the kingdom increased in riches and power. The splendid buildings at Ahmedabad and the ruins of Champanir testify to the wealth of the sovereign, and travellers from beyond the sea bore witness to the prosperity of the kingdom. The Portuguese traveller Duarte Barbosa, who visited Gujarat in A.D. 1511 and A.D. 1514, informs us that “inland he found the capital Champanir a great city, a very fertile country of abundant provisions, and many cows, sheep, goats and plenty of fruit, so that it was full of all good things”; and Ahmedabad “still larger, very rich and well supplied, embellished with good streets and squares with houses of stone and cement.”

The Sultans of Gujarat gradually enlarged their territory and the sway of Bahadur Shah extended from Somnath to Bijapur. He died fighting the Portuguese, who had become the masters of the sea that washed his dominions. After his death the power of his successors began gradually to wane and the kingdom was impoverished and harassed by the constant quarrels of the turbulent nobles. In 1572, a party of them called on the great Akbar, who, meeting with little opposition, entered Gujarat and made Ahmedabad a province of his empire and appointed a Viceroy. With the annexation of the province by Akbar there began a time of far less architectural splendour but of incomparably better government and well-being.

The Sultans of Ahmedabad did what the Muhammadan conquerors have always done wherever their victorious arms have reached; they oppressed their infidel subjects, forbade their worship, destroyed their temples and converted the material to their own uses. In Gujarat they stole not only the materials for building their mosques and tombs, but also the architectural style of the Jains—the adherents of one of the two great heresies from Brahmanism, which arose in the sixth century. Mahāvīra, the founder or reformer of Jainism, with his eleven chief disciples, may be regarded as the first open seceders from Brahmanism, unless one assigns the same date to the revolt of Buddha. "The two schisms have so much in common," says Hopkins in The Religions of India, "especially in outward features, that for long it was thought that Jainism was a sub-sect of Buddhism. In their legends, in the localities in which they flourished, and in many minutiae of observances they are alike. Nevertheless, their differences are as great as the resemblance between them, and what Jainism at first appeared to have got of Buddhism seems now rather the common loan made by each sect from Brahmanism."

Mahāvīra, the reputed founder of his sect, was like Buddha, of aristocratic birth. At the age of twenty-eight he set forth on his mission and betook himself to asceticism. He wandered as an ascetic into many lands, preaching, con-

vertue and enduring the scorn of the wicked. "He was beaten and set upon by sinful men, yet he was never moved to anger." Thus it was that he became the Arhat (venerable), the Jina (victor), the Kivalin (perfect sage). The teaching of the founder became known as Jainism, as Buddhism is the teaching of Buddha the Enlightened. Jainism and Buddhism were merely two out of the dozen heretical sects of importance agitating the region about Benares at the same time. The Jains, as Hopkins says, "drifted westward, while the Buddhist stronghold remained in the east (both of course being represented in the south as well); and so, whereas Buddhism eventually retreated to Nepal and Tibet, the Jains are found in the very centres of old and new (sectarian) Brahmanism, Delhi, Mathura, Jeypur Ajmer." Jainism however never became a dominant creed. Like Quakerism, it found its chief supporters among the rich middle class and to the Peases and Barclays of Western India we owe the costly Jain temples. The faith is still followed by the great banking families of Gujarat. When the Muhammadans conquered the province and built their Mosques they insisted on the essential features of their own style, the minaret and pointed arch, but as they had to employ Hindu architects they adopted the pillared halls and the traceries and rich surface ornament of the vanquished people. But the confounding two distinct and opposite styles of architecture is not a complete success. The Hindu worked out in rock-hewn cavern and dark-pillared hall those ideas of fear and gloom with which his religion associates the divinity. The Muhammadans expressed the simple ideas of glory and praise to an all powerful Jehovah. All the Muslim wants is a courtyard with a tank for ablution, roofed cloisters to shelter the worshippers, a niche in the east wall to indicate the direction of Mecca, a pulpit for the Friday sermon and a tribune or raised platform from which the Koran is recited and prayers intoned. There must be, if possible, a minaret from which to call the faithful to prayer, but the dome is not an essential feature. The first mosque which Ahmed Shah built (1414) illustrates the Moslem's desire to destroy the temples of the heathen and to use their materials to erect his own fane. The mosque itself is founded on the site of ancient temples, and the rows of pillars supporting the dome were taken from infidel shrines. The very carving on the balustrade is Hindu. Nine years after he had built his own private chapel, Ahmed Shah enriched his new capital with the Jumma Musjid, which Ferguson considers to be one of the most beautiful mosques in the east. Quitting the crowd that blocks the streets, we pass through a mean portal into the courtyard of the Jumma Musjid, paved with fine white marble. The first vision overpowers and captivates, but the enchantment does not endure. It has not the special lasting charm which attaches to a building which has some feature peculiar to itself. The three hundred lofty columns supporting the domes are too crowded and their fantastic sculpture seems out of place. It is a Hindu temple converted into a mosque and the soul has gone. On the marble wall opposite the entrance are the words which represent the pride and the humility of the Muslim: "This spacious mosque was erected by Ahmed Shah, a faithful slave of Allah, seeking the mercy of God. He alone is good. He alone is to be worshipped!" We may however admire the exquisite finish of the delicate fretwork and the ornament of the tower, all that is left of the famous shaking minarets. "A little force at the arch of the upper gallery," an ancient traveller states, made both of them shake "though the roof of the mosque remained unchanged." Forbes, in his Oriental Memoirs, describes them "as elegantly proportioned and richly decorated" and "each minaret contains a circular flight of steps leading to a gallery near the summit for the purpose of convening the people to prayer, no bells being in use among the Muhammadans. From these you command an extensive view of Ahmedabad and the Sāburmāli winding through a wide campaign.” The minarets were thrown down by a great earthquake in 1819, “both of them breaking off at the sill of the window whence the call to prayers used to be chanted.”

A door in the east wall of the Jumma Musjid leads to the tomb of its royal founder and his two sons. It is a massive structure surmounted by a dome and lighted at intervals by windows of fine fretwork. Beyond Ahmed’s stately mausoleum is the burying ground of his favourite sultanas. A narrow and dirty lane leads to it. Mounting some steps we reach a platform, and passing through a lofty gateway enter a rectangular court surrounded by a trellised cloister. In the centre are the tombs of the two queens, one of white marble richly carved, girt with an Arabic inscription in minute relief, the other of black marble inlaid with mother of pearl. And beautiful is the contrast between the black and white marble tombs, the simplicity of the form and the richness and delicacy of the details.

The effect of the Jumma Musjid may be more overwhelming, but there is no building in Ahmedabad which is more pleasing to the eye, none which more thoroughly commends itself to the critical judgment, than Rani Sipri’s mosque. It is a Hindu building and it carries out logically the principles of Hindu architecture. No arch, as Fergusson points out, is employed anywhere either constructively or for ornament, and the minarets, though so exquisite in design, are not minarets in reality; they have no internal stairs and no galleries from which the call to prayer could be recited. They are pure ornament of the most graceful kind. The mausoleum, built, like the mosque, of red sandstone, has a substantial grandeur which Ferguson calls heavy, but there can be no difference of opinion as to the marvellous beauty of the carving of the parapet round it. The Queen’s Mosque (in Mirzapur), also built about the same time, has that same wealth of beauty in its details but it is very different in style and general effect. It shows how impossible it is to combine the Muhammadan arcuate style with the Hindu trabeate architecture and preserve harmony. “Although,” as Ferguson says, “the architects had got over much of the awkwardness that characterized their earlier efforts in this direction they had not yet conquered them.” They did not conquer them until the buildings, though not in every detail, became essentially Muhammadan. Shah Alum’s tomb, the Hindu temple of Swámeé Názáyén, the windows and the tracery of the niches of the minarets of the Queen’s Mosque show how the Hindu sculptor could use his chisel with as free and delicate hand as Raphael could his pencil. It is however from the windows in a desecrated mosque in the Bhadar, or old castle, that we gain the highest conception of his faculties. Upon their construction and ornamentation he concentrated all his powers of invention. “It is probably,” says Ferguson, “more like a work of nature than any other architectural detail that has yet been designed even by the best architects of Greece or of the Middle Ages.” They remind one of the fairy water-works in the poet’s enchanted caverns.

“Sometimes like delicatest lattices,
Cover’d with crystal vines : their weeping trees
Moving about, as in a gentle wind ;
Which, in a wink, to wat’ry gauze refined,
Pour into shapes of curtain’d canopies
Spangled and rich with liquid broderies
Of flowers.”

Nowhere does one feel oneself more thoroughly in an eastern city of past times than in the narrow streets of Ahmedabad, thick with ancient houses, none so poor as not to have a doorway or a window or a wooden pillar carved finely. The wide main street is spanned by the Teen Durwaza or Triple Gateway which the royal founder built. It led into the Maidan Shah or Royal Square, the outer enclosure of the Bahdar of Citadel. J. Albert de Mandelslo, who visited Ahmedabad in 1638, and was the guest of the English President, writes: "He brought me to the great market-place called Meydan Schach or the King's Market, which is at least 1,600 feet long, and half as many broad, and beset all about with rows of palm-trees and date-trees, intermixed with citron-trees and orange-trees, whereof there are many in the several streets, which is not only very pleasant to the sight, by the delightful prospect it affords, but also makes the walking among them more convenient, by reason of the coolness." Not far from the Royal Square was the King's Palace. "Over the gate there was a kind of curtain or stage, for the music, consisting of violins, haw-boys and bagpipes which play there in the morning, at noon, in the evening and at midnight, as they do in Persia and all other places where the prince professes the Mahometan religion. All the apartments of the house were sumptuous, gilt and adorned with painting, according to the mode of the country; but more to their satisfaction, who are pleased with diversity of colours, than theirs, who look for invention, and stand upon the exactness of invention." The palace has been converted into a jail and the apartments have been covered with whitewash according to the mode of our civilized government. The gate yet stands, and over it in Persian are the words: "The House of Goodness and Favour," a strange inscription for a jail.

When Mandelslo visited Ahmedabad, Azam Khan was viceroy and "the gentleman belonging to the embassy sent by the Duke of Holstein to the great Duke of Muscovy and the King of Persia" gives us a vivid account of the splendour and riches of his court. "I was credibly informed," he writes, "that he was worth in money and household stuffs ten crou or carroas Ropias, which amounts to fifty millions of crowns, the cro being accounted at a hundred Lake Ropias, each whereof is worth fifty thousand crowns. It was not long before that his daughter, one of the greatest beauties in the country, had been married to the Mogul's second son, and the Chan, when she went to the court, had sent her attended by twenty elephants, a thousand horses, and six thousand waggons loaded with the richest stuffs and whatever else was rare in the country. His Court consisted of above 500 persons, 400 whereof were his slaves who served him in his affairs and were all dieted in the house. I have it from good hands that his expense in housekeeping amounted to about 5,000 crowns a month, not comprehending in that account that of his stables, where he kept five hundred horses and fifty elephants." Mandelslo went "along with the English merchant to visit the Governor and found him sitting in a pavilion or tent which looked into his garden. He was clad in a white vestment, according to the Indian mode, over which he had another that was longer, of Brocadoe, the ground carnation lined with white satin and above a collar of sables, whereof the skins were sewed together, so as that the tails hung down over the back." As soon as he saw them come in the Viceroy made them sit down "by the lords that were with him." After despatching several orders he went and inspected certain troops drawn up in the court. "He would see their arms himself, and caused them to shoot at a mark, thereby to judge of their abilities and to augment the pay of such as did well at the cost of the others, out of whose pay there was so much abated." Seeing him thus employed, Mandelslo and his companion, the President, would have taken their leave, "but he sent us word that we should dine with him."

On his return the Governor asked the Dutchman where he had learnt the Turkish language and whether he had ever been at Constantinople. "I told him I had never been there but had employed the little time abroad in the province of Schirwan and at Ispahan in learning that language, which is as common there as that of the country." The Governor stated that Schirwan was his country, and having known that Mandelslo had particularly known the King of Persia he asked him what he thought of that monarch. "I made answer, that he was a prince of a graceful aspect and person, and one that had understanding and courage enough to be obeyed in his kingdom. He asked me whether he still reigned as a tyrant, and continued his former cruelties. I answered that age having moderated his youthful extravagances, his government began also to be more moderate." The Governor replied: "That he was content to believe that Schach Sessi was an understanding person, but that even as to that there was no more comparison between him and the Mogul than there was between the poverty of the one and the vast wealth of the other, the Prince his master being able to maintain a war against three kings of Persia. I was loth to enter into any contestation upon so ticklish a subject, and therefore only told him that it was indeed true, there was not any comparison between the gold and wealth of Persia, and what I had already seen of the Mogul's kingdom; but that it must be withal confessed that Persia had one thing which could not be had elsewhere, and was in effect inestimable, which was the great number of Kissilbachs, with whose assistance the King of Persia might attempt the conquest of all Asia. Which I said purposely, knowing the Governor was a Kissilbach, and that he could take no offence at such a discourse. Accordingly he discovered his satisfaction thereat, not only in saying that he must grant it to be true, but also, when turning to one of the lords who was a Persian as well as himself, he said to him, Walla beksade, jasehi a-damdar, chassa adamlar souer, that is to say, I believe this young gentleman hath courage when he speaks so well of those that have."

Mandelslo states that the Viceroy was "a judicious understanding man, but hasty and so vigorous that his Government inclined somewhat to cruelty," and relates an occurrence which most certainly shows that the Governor was somewhat inclined to cruelty. The Governor, he tells us, one day being desirous of entertaining "the two principal directors of the English and Dutch trade," sent for twenty women-dancers, "who, as soon as they were come into the room fell a singing and dancing, but with an activity and exact observation of the cadence, much beyond that of our dancers upon the ropes. They had little hoops or circles through which they leaped as nimbly as if they had been so many apes, and made thousands of postures, according to the several soundings of their musick which consisted of a Tumbeek or Timrel, a Haw-boy and several Tabours." After they had danced about two hours the Governor sent for another troupe, who first pleaded illness for not coming; and when he sent a second time "they also were refused as they had another and more pleasing engagement elsewhere, saying they knew well enough the Governor would not pay them." "He laught at it, but immediately commanded out a party of his guard to bring them to him, and they were no sooner entered into the hall ere he ordered their heads to be struck off. They begg'd their lives with horrid cries and lamentations; but he would be obeyed, and caused the execution to be done in the room before all the company, not one of the lords then present daring to make the least intercession for those wretches, who were eight in number. The strangers were startled at the horror of the spectacle and inhumanity of the action, which the Governor, taking notice of, fell a laughing, and asked them what they were so much startled at. 'Assure yourselves, gentlemen,' said he, 'that if I should not take this course, I should not be long Governor of Amadabał.’"

Hard by the Teen Durwáza stands a large upper-roomed building which was once the Dutch factory. Near it was the English factory, but neither the building nor its site can be identified. Mandelslo says: "The English house or lodge is in the middle of the city, well built, and hath many fine and convenient apartments, with spacious courts for the disposal of merchandises. Master Roberts (the Chief) brought me first into his own chamber, which look'd into a little flower garden, in which there was a Fountain. The floor was cover'd with tapestry, and the pillars which sustained the structure were set out with silk-stuffes of several colours, and above a great white tassel according to the custom of the great ones of the country. We had a collation, after which he show'd me the whole house, and brought me into a very fair chamber, with a large closet in it, which he had design'd for my lodging. We supp'd in a great hall, whither the Dutch deputy came after supper to see us, with some of his merchants, with whom I had occasion to be acquainted at Suratta. After he was gone the whole company conducted me to my chamber, where my host kept me company till after midnight. After, that there might not be aught wanting in my entertainment (which in answer to the recommendatory letters I had brought from the President, he would needs have in all things extraordinary) he sent for six women-dancers, the handsomest could be found in the city."

When Captain Best made a trading agreement with the local authorities at Surat (1613) he provided for an establishment at Ahmedabad. The following year Thomas Aldworth having a house and having secured brokers, the factors began to make extensive purchases which, owing to the absence of any European rival, they did with sufficient cheapness. On January 21, 1615, Aldworth set out for Surat "with forty carts laden with indigo and cloths; and an escort which the local government increased because murders and robberies had been committed a few nights previously close to the walls of the city." On February 5, the caravan arrived at Surat, when "the goods were shipped on board of the vessels lying off Swali." In August, Aldworth started again for Ahmedabad. Soon after his arrival there he was smitten with a severe illness, and longing for the sea breeze he had himself carried out of the city on his way back to Surat. But his weakness increased rapidly and he died on October 4, at the village of Neriad. "All is now ended," wrote his friend, Kerridge, "and I destitute by want of so dear a friend, the greatest cross I could have felt in this country." Kerridge now took charge of the Ahmedabad factory. He was a man of imperious temper and a dispute with a native merchant over some indigo led to his being fined and imprisoned. Sir Thomas Roe went, on January 24, 1616, "to the Durbar to visite the king." Jehangir, "having looked curiously and asked many questions of my presents," demanded what he required of him.

"I answered: Justice. That on the assurance of his Majesties Firmanes sent into England, the king, my master, had not only gien leave to many of his subjects to come a dangerous voyadge with their goodes, but had sent mee to congratulat the amytye so happily begunne betwene two soe mighty Nations, and to confirme the same: But that I found the English seated at Amadaus enjured by the Gouernor in their Persons and goodes, fined, exacted upon, and kept as prisoners: that at eurie Towne new customes were taken of our goodes passing to the port, contrarie to all justice and the former Articles of trade. To which hee answered hee was sorry: it should be amended; and presently gave orders for two firmanes very effectually according to my desire to be signed, one to the Gouernor of Amadavaz to restore mony exacted from Master Kerridge, and to use the English with all favour. The other to release all Customs required on any pretence on the way, or if any had beene taken to repay it; of his owne accord wishing mee, that if these gave me not speedy remedy, I should renew my complaint against the disobeyour, and hee should be sent for to answere there. And soe hee dismissed mee.

When Roe accompanied the Emperor to Ahmedabad he found there a large party of English factors carrying on an extensive trade. The city attracted the commerce of the east. "There is not," says Mandelslo, "in a manner any nation or any merchandise in all Asia which may not be had at Amadabath." The labour of an industrious and ingenious people was employed in the manufacture of silk and cotton fabrics of every description, in metal work, wood and ivory carving, and in inlay. "'Tis true, they seldom use any silk in that country, much less any out of Persia, because it is somewhat too coarse and too dear, but they ordinarily make use of that of China, which is very fine, mingling it with that of Bengal, which is not quite so fine, but much beyond that of Persia, and much cheaper. They also make there great quantities of gold and silver Brocades, but they put too much thin lace into them, so that in goodness and substance they come not near those of Persia, though some of them amount in the country to eighteen crowns the piece."

At the time when Mandelslo was in Ahmedabad they had begun to make a new kind of stuff of silk and cotton with flowers of gold which was very much esteemed, and sold at five crowns the ell; but the inhabitants were forbidden the wearing of it, upon this account, that the king reserv’d it for his own, yet not so strictly but that he permitted Forraigners to buy of it, to be transported out of the kingdom. They make there also all sorts of satins and velvets of all sorts of Colours—taffata, satins for linings, of both Thread and silk, Alcatifs or Carpets, the ground Gold, Silk or

Yarn, but not so good as those of Persia, and all sorts of cotton.” The commerce of Ahmedabad has declined, but a considerable number of persons are still employed in the manufacture of objects of taste and ornament. The goldsmiths yet make a number of well-arted things, round necklaces, bracelets, nose-rings and earrings of chopped pieces of gold strung on red silk. “It is the finest archaic jewellery in India,” says Sir George Birdwood, whose genius first revealed to the West the beauty and variety of Indian art. “The nail-headed earrings are,” he adds, “identical with those represented on Assyrian sculptures.” This jewellery is worn throughout India by the people as a safe investment. At Ahmedabad you will see in the streets little naked girls of perfect shape, whose neck and arms and ankles are shackled with jujubes of gold. Now and then one of them is enticed away and the tiny body found in a well without its ornaments. The coppersmith yet hammers his brass pots and bestows all his skill in making finely cut brass screens and boxes covered with the most elaborate design for my lady’s jewellery, sweets and spices. At Ahmedabad they still make quantities of gold and silver brocadoes, and the stuff of silk and flowers of gold (kincobs) is still esteemed by every chief in India and sold at more than five crowns the ell. The manufacture of the gold and silver thread used in them employ many skilful workers. The wire-drawer (tania) turns out six or eight hundred yards of thread from half an ounce of silver. “So great is his delicacy of touch that if desired the tania can draw out half an ounce of silver into 2,000 yards of thread, a feat all the more wonderful that for boring the holes in his draw-plate the workman has no finer tool than the file pointed end of an old umballa steel.”

Hard by the goldsmiths an aged Muhammadan beats a book with a heavy-headed iron hammer. He is making gold-foil for the confectioner, to cover his sweetmeats, and for the hemp-smoker to stretch across the bowl of his pipe in which the live coal is placed. Yellow tin foil is wrought to decorate the images of the gods and the lintel and side-posts of the house-doors on high festivals. An infinitely more important art in which India was distinguished two thousand years ago still flourishes at Ahmedabad. Within the potter’s houses are shapes of clay “of all sorts and sizes great and small,” and all of perfect form. He uses red ochre, white earth, and mica to give them a light colour, and he polishes the great jars, in which the forty thieves hid, with a piece of bamboo or a string of agate pebbles. Outside his mud den he sits and spins his primitive wheel as his forefathers did in the days of Menu, and the potter and his wheel carries you back a few thousand years. On Christmas Eve we saw, as we drove to Sarkhej, a scene which Kalidasa, the Shakespeare of the Indian drama, depicted fifteen centuries ago. The Sabarmati River was low, and its sandy bed was lined with men and women and children, robed in vestments of the purest white, of azure, green, and purple. Some of the damsels were chatting and exchanging gossip as they filled their copper jars, some were splashing in the stream whilst others—

“Bolder grown,
O'er a friend's head a watery stream have thrown,
And the drenched girl, her long, black hair united,
Wrings out the water with the sandel dyed.
Still is their driss most lovely, though their play
Has loosed their locks, and washed their dye away.
And though the pearls, that went their neck to grace
Have slipped, disordered from their resting place.”

A bullock cart, most primitive of human forms of conveyance, is crossing the stream. “Listen, sisters (streams), kindly to him who praises you, who has come from afar with a waggon and a chariot; bow down lowlily, become easily fordable. Remain, rivers, lower than the axle (of the wheel) with your currents.”. Beyond the river the wide white road runs through a great plain with its dim memories dating back before the earliest dawn of history. Here the peasants have lived their rude simple lives for many a century; and have chanted their hymn for the ploughing season. "May the oxen (draw) happily, the men labour happily, the plough furrow happily." They have sown and reaped their grain, they have picked the snowy flake of cotton, they have planted the sugar-cane, they have cultivated mustard for oil-cakes to feed the oxen, while Rajpoot and Muslim have contended, and conquering races have come and gone.

Hard by the road are the remains of the mighty sepulchres of their conquerors, and from a crumbling wall shoots the sacred fig tree. "The revolving current of life," says one of their ancient hymns meant for all time and all mankind, "resembles the Aswatha, the eternal sacred fig-tree which grows with its roots above and its branches downwards."

After driving about three miles across the great plain clothed with groves of mangoes, lofty tamarinds with feathery leaves of bluish green and wide-spaying banyans, we saw in the distance a white dome glistening in the sun. It was the roza of Ganj Baksh, and a few miles further on the terrace on which the tomb stands was reached. Alighting from our carriage we passed through a covered gateway into a large flagged court on the right of which is a fairy kiosk, formed of sixteen slender columns supporting nine domes, and behind it rises the massive and stately tomb of the Saint Shaik Ahmad Khattu Ganj Bakhsh, the friend and spiritual guide of the royal founder of Ahmedabad. He belonged to an austere mendicant fraternity and tradition asserts, says Briggs, that no circumstance would induce him to alter his mode of life, though wealth and every sublunary honour within the gift of a powerful Muslim potentate were offered. There are many stories told of the holy Fakir. The most popular of these is the one told by the custodian to the pilgrims who from all parts of Gujarat resort to his shrine once a year.

"He was a saintly mortal, Ganj Baksh: he was free from the sensualities to which our race is prone; his heart was ever with Alla (whose name be praised), and his thoughts with Muhammad (blessings upon our holy prophet); his life was one of Virgin purity; his death that of the beatified, Alla il Alla, etc.; kings of the earth were admonished by him; the holiest found him a friend. Wealth was profusely scattered at his feet, but he saw it not, received it not. Alla was his all. Before he passed from this world to the Paradise of our hopes, he built this roza. The labourers and artificers employed by him were daily paid their hire, and the good genii who supplied the funds deposited the exact quota to be appropriated beneath the carpet of the holy Ganj Baksh. Thus was built this delightful mausoleum to the memory of a saint whose virtues we can still revere, if our imperfections prevent a close pursuit upon his footsteps, Alla il Alla, etc."

Ganj Baksh did not erect the roza. It was begun the year the saint died (1445) by Sultan Ahmed's son Muhammad II., and completed six years later by Ahmed's grandson, Jalal Khan, better known as Kitub-ud-din. It is certainly a delightful mausoleum. The treillis work which encloses the tomb is wrought with lavish luxuriance of imagination and incredible perfection of detail. The brass lattice windows around the shrine also bear testimony to the power of the Hindu designer. •The buildings possess two characteristics peculiarly their own, their pure Hindu style and their redundant richness. To the west of the Mausoleum is a large quadrangle with a mosque on its western face. It illustrates how during the twenty-five years that had rolled on since the building of the Jumma Mosque the architect had advanced in Muhammadan simplicity. It has the five domes of the Jumma Mosque but the pillars, as Fergusson points out, are fewer in number, more widely spaced and better arranged. "Except the Motee Musjid at Agra," he writes, "no mosque in India is more remarkable for simple elegance than this." The southern face of the quadrangle overlooks the great lake which Mahmud Begada excavated and surrounded with gigantic flights of steps and built on its border a splendid palace and harem. In a handsome tomb enclosed like the sepulchre of the Saint with well wrought trellis work lies Mahmud Begada and his sons, and a porch rich in carved niches supported by three pillars, miracles of size and perfection, separate it from the tomb of his Queen.

We had our dinner in the ruins of the Harem. The night was cool, and fragrant with orange blossoms. The stars shone from the depths of an eastern sky with steady lustre.
The moonlight slept on crumbled wall and marble pillars.
We reluctantly left the fairy haunt and drove back to the turmoil of the city.

MOUNT ABU AND AJMER

THE journey onward from Ahmedabad will lead us as its next natural stopping-place to the isolated peak of Mount Abu, "the Saints' Pinnacle," the Rajpoot Olympus. The traveller who, after traversing the richly cultivated plain of Gujarat, mounts that lofty ridge will understand the influence which the physical features and situation of the country spreading out before him have exercised on the races who have lived on it. They are strongly marked. A little to the east of Mount Abu commences the chain of the Arvalis, or "mountains of strength," which stretch away in bold ridges towards Delhi, which has been, and always will be, the capital of India. Running north and south, they form the backbone of Upper India, and on the west lie the arid plains and ever shifting sandhills of Marwar, Jesselmer, and Bikaner; on the east are the forests and plains of black loam furrowed by running streams, of Mewar Bundi, Kotah, Ajmer, and Jeyapore. The vast and varied region which extends from the frontier of Sind on the west to the fort of Agra on the east, and from the sandy tracts of the Sutlej on the north to the Vindhya range separating it from the Deccan or "South," is known by the collective and classical denomination Rajast'hán, "the abode of princes." "In the familiar dialect of these countries," says Tod, who has done for Rajpootana what the great Wizard of the North has done for Scotland, "it is

87

termed Rajwarra, by the more refined Raet'hana, corrupted to Rajpoota, the common designation among the British to denote the Rajpoot principalities.” Nature meant it to be the abode of chiefs. Tod, in his Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthàn, the true Rajpoot epic alike in the vastness of its scope and in the completeness of its execution, has by pen and pencil revealed the beauty and variety of the land where the age of chivalry has not fled. Tod guides us through the Marcosihulli, or region of death (the emphatic and figurative name for the desert), to Bikaner, Jodpoor, and Jesselmer and the fair valley of Oodipoor. He conducts us on the east of the range through the Patar (table, pat, mountain, ar), or great Plateau of Central India watered by the Chumbul, the paramount lord of the floods and many a noble stream. “The surface of this extensive plateau,” he tells us, “is greatly diversified.” There are great rolling waves of country where the protruding rocks present not a trace of vegetation; there are, besides, tracts yellow in harvest-time with ripened wheat and dotted with the roofs of a hardy and valiant yeomanry. There are ranges of rugged hills, while below them spread valleys with low meads, abundantly watered with numerous rills, and cultivation “raised with infinite labour on terraces, as the vine is cultivated in Switzerland and on the Rhine.” There are beetling cliffs overhanging the rippling streams, crowned with the fortress-homes of the proud Rajpoot chiefs who claim their descent from the sun or from the moon, and whose ancestors have for ages exercised sovereign power. Every petty Rajpoot chief, and every member of his family or clan, believes with the intensity of an undoubting faith that he is of an ancient, illustrious, and royal descent. Tod tells us that each race has “its genealogical tree, describing the essential peculiarities, religious tenets, and pristine locale of the clan” that every Rajpoot should be able to repeat this creed, and that in point of fact “there is scarcely a chief of character for knowledge who cannot repeat the genealogy of his line,” though in these degenerate days many are satisfied with referring to the family bard or chronicler. These genealogical tables are “the touchstone of affinities, and guardians of the laws of intermarriage.” Caste has ever prevented the inferior class of society from being incorporated with this haughty noblesse. Only those of pure blood in both lines can hold fiefs of the crown. The highest may marry the daughter of a Rajpoot, whose sole possession is “a skin of land”; the sovereign himself is not degraded by such alliance. It is his blood, and not the number of his acres, which ennobles the Rajpoot. He does not derive his title from the land, but he gives his name to the land. The State takes the name of the capital which is the residence and stronghold of the chief, and the capital takes the name of the chief who founded it. The Rajpoot considers there are two professions fit for a man—to conquer and to govern. “The poorest Rajpoot of this day retains all the pride of ancestry, often his sole inheritance; he scorns to hold the plough or to use his lance but on horseback.” When a Rajpoot chief was unable to provide for a younger son he gave him a horse and a lance, and the lad with some companions went forth to serve some sovereign or to found a state. He had learnt in his father’s desert home or mountain eyrie the business of war and the craft of government. Thus the Rajpoot spread over the continent of India and influenced its history. It is the desert and the mountain which have influenced the historical process and feudal constitution of Rajpootana, and has enabled the Rajpoot to maintain to this day those social and religious institutions which make Rajpootana one of the most interesting and romantic spots in the continent of India.

On the summit of Mount Abu the marble Jain shrines preserve the highest ideals of pure Hindu architecture. And from them may be deduced interesting evidence bearing upon the national character and creed. At a point where a lovely valley begins to close on an enormous plateau of granite, stands, warm and glowing, a mass of white marble. It is the four sacred shrines. Nine hundred years ago the most ancient of them was built by a merchant prince. The marble was not quarried from the mountain side, but it was transported some hundred miles and dragged up the steep mountain by a patient race to whom a century is but a day. Some years ago we were walking through a remote Deccan village and noticed a large stone pillar richly carved, lying by the roadside. We asked its origin and destination. The Patel, or head village officer, told us it was intended for the porch of the temple on the steep cliff overlooking the hamlet two miles away. "The villagers drag it," he added, "on great festivals, and, oh! Sahib, in my lifetime they have moved it a hundred yards." He was bordering on fifty. "And see how much carving they have done," and he pointed to some eight inches of rich decoration. The old Brahman priest who accompanied us noticed our look of surprise and wonderment, and said, "You English are in such a hurry. There is the age of brass and the age of iron. They come and they go. Others have come and gone their way, and so you will go. But the pillar will reach the temple." In this spirit were these marble shrines at Abu hewn into transparent strength and the shafts erected above the marble courtyards; "the white cupola rise like wreaths of sea foam in the dawn." The desire of the Jain is to attain victory over all worldly desires to fill his soul, and so become divine. He therefore builds his temple to shut out the garish day and to give cool dark spaces shadowing forth the rest to which he looks forward. He filled the windows with marble tracery, through which the broken light falls, and a few beams fade away into the cell on to the image of the twenty-second deified saint, seated cross-legged and with folded hands. In the colonnade around are fifty-seven cells, and in each cell the identical image of the same god, with the same folded hands, with the same expression quiet, and so weary. It reveals the feelings of the worshippers, to whom salvation comes after eight births, when a man has started on the right road. And the first Jain of the long series of prehistoric prophets lived more than eight million years. "Patience is the highest good" is the Jain's creed.

About the centre of the Aravali range on the west side lies the British province of Ajmer-Merwara, surrounded by the Protected States of Rajpootana. The city, like the majority of Rajpoot cities, stands well. Situated in a fertile valley, it lies between a great lake and a magnificent isolated hill crowned with a fortress called Taragarh, the Home of the Stars. It is a spot which the first settlers would choose for a dwelling-place. It is a spot which, on account of its geographical position, the Muhammadan invaders would select as the centre of their operations against Rajpootana, and the dry climate of the plateau, three thousand feet above the sea, would be an attraction. Ajmer, "according to the traditional couplet and the poetic legends of its ancient princes, was visited by the first hostile forces which Islam sent across the Indus," and it became the favourite haunt of Moghuls and Pathans. Many are the traces of the heavy hand of the warriors and the conquerors who thought it glory and not shame to destroy the works of the Inhdel and to turn them to the purpose of the believer.

The Arhai-din-ka-jhompra, or "the hut of two and a half days," is an example of how the Muhammadan conquerors took the chief Pagan shrines of a city as a trophy of their own faith. It is built on the western declivity of the mountain, and derives its name from its having occupied, as tradition tells, its magical builders only this short period in its erection. Tod, who gives a fine illustration of the "ancient Jain Temple at Ajmer," writes:—"The Temple is surrounded by a superb screen of Saracenic architecture,

having the main front and gateway to the north. From its simplicity, as well as its appearance of antiquity, I am inclined to assign the screen to the first dynasty, the Ghorian Sultans, who evidently made use of native architects. The entrance arch is that wavy kind, characteristic of what is termed the Saracenic, whether the term be applied to the Alhambra of Spain or the Mosque of Delhi, and I am disposed on close examination to pronounce it Hindu. The entire façade of this noble entrance, which I regret I cannot have engraved, is covered with Arabic inscriptions. But, unless my eye much deceived me, the small frieze over the apex of the arch contained an inscription in Sanscrit, with which Arabic has been commingled, both being unintelligible. The remains of a minaret still maintain their position on the right flank of the gate, with a door and steps leading to it for the muezzim to call the faithful to prayers. A line of smaller arches of similar form composes the front of the screen. The design is chaste and beautiful, and the material, which is a compact limestone of a yellow colour, admitting almost of as high a polish as the jaune antique gave abundant scope to the sculptor.” Ferguson endorses Tod’s estimate of the beauty of the screen and its decoration. He writes:—“Nothing can exceed the taste with which the Cufic and Togra inscriptions are interwoven with the more purely architectural decoration, or the manner in which they give life and variety to the whole without ever interfering with the constructive lines of the design. Nothing in Cairo or in Persia is so exquisite in detail, and nothing in Spain or Syria can approach them for beauty of surface decoration. Besides this, they are unique. Nowhere else could it be possible to find Muhammadan largeness of conception, combined with Hindu delicacy of ornamentation, carried out to the extent and in the same manner.” The description of the pillared hall which now forms the mosque, given by Tod, is both picturesque and accurate. “Its plan is simple and consonant with all the more ancient temples of the Jains. It is an extensive saloon, the ceiling supported by a quadruple range of columns, those of the centre being surmounted by a range of vaulted coverings, while the lateral portion, which is flat, is divided into compartments of the most elaborate sculpture. But the columns are most worthy of attention; they are unique in design, and, with the exception of the cave-temples, probably among the oldest now existing in India. On examining them, ideas entirely novel, even in Hindu art, are developed. Like all these portions of Hindu architecture their ornaments are very complex, and the observer will not fail to be struck with their dissimilarity; it was evidently a rule to make the ornaments of every part unlike the other, and this I have seen carried to great extent. There may be forty columns, but no two are alike. The ornaments of the base are peculiar, both as to form and execution; the lozenges, with the rich tracery surmounting them, might be transferred not inappropriately to the Gothic cathedrals of Europe. The projections from the various parts of the shafts (which on a small scale may be compared to the corresponding projections of the columns in the Duomo at Milan) with the small niches still containing the statues, though occasionally mutilated, of the Pontiffs of the Jains, give them a character which strengthens the comparison. The elegant Cāmincūmāḍa, the emblem of the Hindu Ceres, with its pendant palmyra-branches, is here lost, as are many emblematical ornaments, curious in design and elegant in their execution. Here and there occurs a richly carved corbeille, which still further sustains the analogy between the two systems of architecture, and the capitals are at once strong and delicate." The central vault consists of a series of diminishing amulets (or rings), richly ornamented, converging to the apex, from which projects a heavy stone pendentive carved in open work. Tod supposes that the Hindu shrine was built two centuries before Christ, but

General Cunningham infers, "but with some hesitation," that most of the temples which furnished materials for the building of the great mosque must have been erected during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. a slave of Kutb-ud-din, to whom he had given his daughter in marriage, and was therefore built seven years later than the Kutb Mosque at Delhi.\(^1\) In the latter the Mazinah, or Muezzin’s tower, for calling the faithful to prayer, is a distinct and separate building, known as the celebrated Kutb Minar. But in the Ajmer Mosque we have the earliest example of a pair of Muezzin towers in two small minars, which are placed on the top of the screen wall over the great centre arch. “The tops of both of these minars are now ruined, but enough still remains to show that they were sloping hollow towers, with twenty-four faces or flutes alternately angular and circular, just like those of the Kutb Minar.” All who have seen the two mosques will agree with Cunningham that “in gorgeous prodigality of ornament, for beautiful richness of tracery, and endless variety of detail, in delicate sharpness of finish, and laborious accuracy of workmanship, all of which are due to the Hindu masons, these two grand Indian mosques may justly vie with the noblest buildings which the world has yet produced.” We, however, consider that the mosque at Ajmer is far more interesting than its rival at old Delhi.

Above the mosque towers “the fortress of the goatherd.” “Aja Pal\(^2\) was, as his name implies, a goatherd,” says Tod, “whose piety in supplying one of the saints with daily libations of goat’s milk procured him a territory. Satisfied with the scene of his early days, he commenced his castle on the serpent-mount in his own province; but his evil genius knocking down in the night what he erected in the day, he sought out another site on the opposite side of the range, hence arose the far-famed Aja-mer. The towers and battlements built by Aja-Pal still remain, but the palaces of the Cohans have long since fallen into ruin. It is, however, good to ascend the mountain and see the green valley, the wide sheet of silver men call Ana Saugur,¹ the splintered pinnacles and granite hills in the golden morning sunshine. Beyond the red hills stretches the yellow desert, "The Kingdom of Death."

Nine centuries have rolled on since Ana Raja constructed Ana Saugur, one of the most perfect of lakes. Jehangir, "The Conqueror of the World," adorned its bank with the Doulat Bagh (The Garden of Splendour), filled with fruit and flowers, where he with his consort, Nur Jehan (The Light of the World), might find repose away from the cares of State. Shah Jehan (Lord of the World), his son, erected the marble pavilions reflected in its seductive water. The Garden of Splendour was a pleasant retreat for the luxurious Emperor from the fortified palace erected by the Great Akbar, when Ajmer became, after the fall of Chittore, an integral portion of the Moghul Empire, and gave its name to a Subah or province which included the whole of Rajpootana. Though Chittore, "The Rock of their Strength," had been despoiled and bereft of all symbols of regality, the Rajpoot warriors maintained a gallant and long protracted struggle. But they had to yield to the hosts of Delhi, and "the crimson banner," which for more than eight hundred years had waved in proud independence over the head of the Geholes, was now to be abased to the son of Jehangir. Jehangir, in his autobiography, which deserves to rank with the immortal diary of Pepys, writes: "Pleasing intelligence arrived of the intention of Rana Umra Sing to repair and make his obedience to me. My fortunate son Khoorum had established my authority and garrisons in divers strongholds of the country of the Ranas." The noble Umra, who had so long and signalily foiled the Imperial armies, is one of the Paladins of Rajpoot chivalry. "He was beloved of his chiefs for the qualities they most esteem, generosity and valour, and by his subjects for his justice and kindness, of which we can judge from his edicts, many of which yet live in the columns or the rock.” Umra informed Prince Khoorum that he would “send his eldest son to attend and serve the Emperor, as did other Hindu princes,” but the proud Rajpoot chief added, “on account of his years he would hold himself excused from attending in person.” Jehangir, delighted at the submission of so formidable an enemy, writes: “I forgave the Rana, and sent a friendly firman in that he might rest assured of my protection and care, and imprinted thereon, as a solemn testimony of my sincerity, my ‘five fingers’ (punja);¹ I also wrote my son, by any means by which it could be brought about, to treat this illustrious one according to my wishes.” Khoorum offered to withdraw every Muhammadan from Mewar if the Rana would but receive the Emperor’s firman outside his capital. “This his proud soul rejected; and though he visited Prince Khoorum as a friend he spurned the proposition of acknowledging a superior or receiving the rank and titles awaiting such an admission.” Umra determined to abdicate the throne. Assembling his chiefs and disclosing his determination, he made the teeka² on his son’s forehead, and observing that the honour of Mewar was now in his hands, forthwith left the capital and secluded himself in a palace on a cluster of hills, "nor did he from that hour cross its threshold, but to have his ashes deposited with those of his fathers." Umra's son proceeded to Ajmer, "paid his respect, and his rank was commanded to be at the request of my son immediately on my right hand, and I rewarded him with suitable khelats." Sir Thomas Roe, who was present at the Durbar, states that "the son of Ranna, his new Tributary, was brought within the little rayle, the King embracing him by the head. . . . His guilt was an Indian vyder (broad dish) full of silver, upon yt a carved silver dish full of gould. Soe he was led towards the Prince." The gallant races which by the wise policy of Akbar and Jehangir became the strongest supporters of the Moghul Empire, were hopelessly alienated by the fanatical persecutions of Aurangzeb. He made Ajmer his headquarters during the war with Mewar and Marwar, brought about by his own bigotry. The Rajpoots in their mountain fastnesses defied for many a month and many a year the armies of the Moghuls. On the death of Aurangzeb the three great Rajpoot chiefs, the Rana of Oudepoor, the Raja of Marwar, Ajit Sing, and the Raja of Jeypore, Jey Sing II., obtained from his successor an acknowledgment of virtual independence. The daughter of Ajit Sing married the Moghul Emperor Farukshir, whom Hamilton, the English doctor, cured of a troublesome disease, and obtained from the grateful monarch the first grant of land to the East India Company. Farukshir was thrown into a dungeon, his eyes being put out, and he was strangled by command of the Barha Seiads (that is, descendants of the prophets), the Warwicks of Delhi. The King-makers put two other puppets on the throne, but the third puppet, Muhammad Shah, proved too strong for them, and the power of the Seiads went for ever. When Ajit Sing heard of the overthrow of the vigorous and able Seiads and the disorder of the Moghul government, he struck a blow for sovereignty. He advanced against Aj-

mer, and drove the Muslims from the city. "He slew the King's governor, and seized on Tarragurh. Once more the bell of prayers was heard in the temple while the bang of the Mesjid was silent. 1 Where the Koran was read the Puran 2 was now heard, and the mindra 3 took the place of the mosque. The Kazi made way for the Brahman, and the pit of burnt sacrifice (homa) was dug, when the sacred kine was slain." The enthusiastic chronicler adds, "The records were always moist with inserting fresh conquests." Ajit Sing assumed every emblem of sovereign rule. "He coined in his own name, established his own guz (measure) and seu (weight), his own courts of justice, and a new scale of rank for his chiefs." But Ajit's independence was of short duration. According to the chronicle, in the following year (1721) the Moghul Emperor (Muhammad Shah) prepared a formidable army and the contingents of the twenty-two Satraps of the Empire. "In the month of Sawun (July) Tarragurh was invested. . . . It had held out four months, when through the prince of Amber (Jey Sing) Ajit listened to terms, which were sworn to on the Koran by the nobles and the king; and he agreed to surrender Ajmer." In 1721 the Rajpoot bard states "Ajit went to heaven." In plain prose, he was murdered by his two elder sons, Abhe Sing and Bukht Sing, who were by the same mother, a princess of Boondi. "To Bukht Sing, who was with his father, the eldest brother wrote promising him the independent sovereignty of Nagore (where they then were), with its five hundred and fifty-five townships, as the price of murdering their common sire. Bukht crept one night to his father's bed, and from a pallet on which were placed the arms of Ajit he took his sword and slew him. The mother was awakened by the blood of her lord moistening her bosom. Her cries awoke the faithful Rajpoots who lay in the adjacent apartments, and who, bursting into the chamber, discovered their prince dead. "The assassin fled to the roof of the palace, barring the gates behind him, which resisted all attempts to force them until morning, when he threw into the court below the letter of his brother, exclaiming, 'This put the Maharaja to death, not I.'" "On Asar the 13, the dark half of the moon of 1780 (1739)," says the chronicle, seventeen hundred warriors for the last time marched before their lord. "They placed his body in a boat,1 and carried him to the pyre made of sandal wood and perfumes, with heaps of cotton, oil, and camphor. The Nazir (Head of the Harem) went to the Queen's Palace, and as he pronounced the words 'Rao Sidaôe,' 2 the Chohani queen with sixteen damsels in her suite came forth. 'This day,' said she, 'is one of joy; my race shall be illustrated; our lives have passed together, how then can I leave him? Of noble race was the Bhattiani queen. She put up a prayer to the Lord who wields the discus (Krishna). 'With joy I accompany my lord; that my fealty (sati) may be accepted rests with Thee.' In like manner did the Gazelle (Mrgavati) of Derawul, and the Tuar queen of pure blood, the Chaora Rani and her of Shekhavati invoke the name of Heri as they determined to join their lord. For these six queens death had no terror, but they were the affianced wives of their lord; the curtain wives of affection, to the number of fifty-eight, determined to offer themselves a sacrifice to Agni (the fire). 'Such an opportunity,' said they, 'can never occur.' While thus each spoke Nathoo the Nazir thus addressed them 'This is no amusement: the sandal wood you now anoint with is cool; but will your resolution abide, when you remove it with the flames of Agni.'2 When this scorches your tender frames, your hearts may fail, and the desire to recede will disgrace your lord’s memory. Reflect and remain where you are. You have lived like Indrani (the Queen of Heaven), nursed in softness amidst flowers and perfumes; the winds of heaven never offended you, far less the flames of fire.’ But to all his arguments they replied; ‘The world we will abandon, but never our lord.’ They performed their ablutions, decked themselves in their gayest attire, and for the last time made obeisance to their lord in his car. The drum sounded; the funeral train moved on; all invoked the name of Heri.1 The countenances of the Queens were as radiant as the sun. They mounted the pyre and as the smoke emitted from the house of flame, ascended to the sky, the assembled multitudes shouted Khaman, Khaman (well done, well done). The pile flamed like a volcano; the faithful queens laved their bodies in the flames, as do the celestials in the lake Mansurwar.2 They sacrificed their bodies to their lord, and illustrated the race whence they sprang.”

As one of the queens ascended the pyre she pronounced the anathema so terrific to the ears of the patriotic Rajpoot—“May the bones of his murderer be consumed out of Maroo.”3 Abhe Sing became sovereign, and he bestowed on his brother, Bukht Sing, not only Nagore, but also Jhalore. Abhe was appointed by the Emperor Viceroy of Ahmedabad, and Ajmer became a part of Marwar. It was during his reign that Nadir Shah invaded India, but the summons to the Rajpoot princes to put forth their strength in support of the tottering throne of Timour was received with indifference. Not a chief of note led his myrmidons to the plains of Kurnal, and Delhi was invested, plundered, and its monarch dethroned without exciting a sigh. Abbe Sing died in 1750 (seven years before Plassey), and was succeeded by his son, Ram Sing, who had more than his share of the pride and impetuosity of his race. He demanded the instant surrender of Jhalore. The request insolently made was courteously refused. "War was decided on; the challenge was given and accepted, and the plains of Mairta were fixed upon to determine this mortal strife in which brother was to meet brother and all the ties of kin were to be severed by the sword." All lovers of Tod know how the heir of Mehtri, with his father and brothers, sealed his fealty with his blood on the fatal field of Mairta. "He had long engaged the hand of a daughter of a chief of the Nirookas, and was occupied with the marriage rites, when tidings reached him of the approach of the rebels to Mairta. In the bridal vestments, with the nuptial coronet (mor) encircling his forehead he took his station with his clan on the second day's fight, and obtained a bride in Indra's abode." After a desperate struggle Ram Sing was defeated, and flying south he joined the Mahratta leader Jey Appa Sindia, with whom he concerted measures for the invasion of his country. Rajpoots of every rank rose to oppose this first attempt of the Mahrattas to interfere in their national quarrels, and led by Bukht in person advanced to meet them. Bukht encamped in the passes near Ajmer. Hither one of the queens of the Prince of Amber, a niece of Bukht, repaired, and to her was entrusted by her husband the task of murdering her uncle, who had demanded his assistance against Ram Sing. The mode in which the deed was effected is told by Tod:

"A poisoned robe was the medium of revenge. Raja Bukht, soon after the arrival of his niece, was declared in a fever; the physician was summoned: but the man of secrets, the vedya, declared he was beyond the reach of medicine, and bade him prepare for other scenes. The intrepid Rahtore, yet undismayed, received the tidings even with a jest. 'What! Soojaa,' said he, 'no cure? Why do you take my lands and eat my produce, if you cannot combat my maladies? What is your art good for?' The vedya excavated a small trench in the tent, which he filled with water; throwing into it some ingredient, the water became gelid. 'This,' said he, 'can be effected by human skill; but your case is beyond it; haste, perform the offices which religion demands.' With perfect composure he ordered the chiefs to assemble in his tent; and having recommended to their protection, and received their promise of defending the rights of his son, he summoned the ministers of religion into his presence. The last gifts to the church and these, her organs, were prepared; but with all his firmness, the anathema of the Satis, as they ascended the funeral pyre on which his hand had stretched his father, came into his mind; and as he repeated the ejaculation, 'may your corpse be consumed in a foreign land!' he remembered he was then on the border. The images which crossed his mental vision it is vain to surmise: he expired as he uttered these words: and over his remains, which were burnt on the spot, a cenotaph was erected, and is still called Booro Dewul, the 'Shrine of Evil.'"

The feudal chiefs of Marwar recognized, and swore to maintain the rights of Beejy Sing, the son of Bukht. He led them to the plains of Maierta, but the cohorts of the Rajpoot clans were unable to withstand the well-served artillery of the Mahrattas. After a desperate contest "The Lord of Marwar, who on that morning commanded the lives of one hundred thousand Rajpoots, was indebted for his safety to the mean conveyance of a cart and pair of oxen." After this victory the cause of Ram Sing was triumphant, and the Mahrattas were spreading over the land of Maroo when the assassination of their chief checked their progress.

"A Rajpoot and an Afghan, both foot soldiers on a small monthly pay, offered, if their families were provided for, to sacrifice themselves for his safety by the assassination of the Mahratta commander. Assuming the garb of camp-suttlers, they approached the headquarters, feigning a violent quarrel. The simple Mahratta chief was performing his ablutions at the doors of his tent, which as they approached they became more vociferous, and throwing a bundle of statements of account on the ground, begged he would decide between them. In this manner they came nearer and nearer, and as he listened to their story, one plunged his dagger in his side, exclaiming 'this for Nagore!' and 'this for Jodpoor!' said his companion, as he repeated the mortal blow. The alarm was given; the Afghan was slain; but the Rajpoot called out 'thief,' and mingling with the throng escaped by a drain into the town of Nagore.'

The siege lasted for six months after the murder, when a treaty was made under which the Mahrattas abandoned Ram Sing to "his evil star" on the condition of receiving a fixed triennial tribute. The fortress and district of Ajmer was surrendered in full sovereignty to the Mahrattas, in moondkati, or compensation, for the blood of Jey Appa.

"The monsoon was then approaching; they broke up and took possession of this important conquest, which, placed in the very heart of these regions, may be called the key of Rajpootana." For sixty-two years the Mahrattas remained masters of the key of Rajpootana. The Rajpoort chiefs were too weak and divided by intestine feuds to be able to oppose the extortions and indignities of the Mahratta predatory rulers, and when the power of the Mahrattas decayed, their provinces were harassed by the Pindaree freebooters and the Afghan mercenaries of Amir Khan. Central India, including Rajpootana, was laid waste, villages burnt, the ryots tortured in order to extort the discovery of their scanty store, because the Power to whom the sovereignty of India had passed would not realize that an Imperial position entails Imperial obligations. The Imperial policy of Wellesley which established a close bond of connexion between the British Government and the principal States of India was abandoned by his successors, Cornwallis and Barlow, acting under the orders of their masters at home. The doctrine of non-interference was introduced, a policy which under the specious guise of moderation was a policy of weakness and a cruel dereliction of duty. The Rajpoot chiefs claimed the protection and interference of the British power on the grounds of justice. Sir Charles Metcalfe, Resident for Rajpootana, wrote: "They say that there always has existed some power in India to which peaceable States submitted and in return obtained its protection. . . . The British Government now occupies the place of the great protecting Power, and is the natural guardian of the peaceable and weak; but, owing to its refusal to use its influence for their protection, the peaceable and weak States are continually exposed to the oppressions and cruelties of robbers and plunderers, the most licentious and abandoned of mankind." The robbers and plunderers now ventured to extend their depredations into British territory. The Marquis of Hastings, who when in Parliament attacked the policy of Wellesley, saw, soon after he assumed the office of Governor-General, that it was the only practicable policy. The British authority must be supreme throughout India. The British Government must be lord paramount over all the sovereigns and princes of the continent. After having brought to a successful issue his war with the Nepalese the Governor-General determined to make effective preparations for the crushing of the Pindarees. The freebooters looked for support to Daulat Rao Sindia as the most powerful of the Mahratta princes. But the measures of Lord Hastings were so speedy and effective that Sindia was compelled to associate with the Company against the Pindarees, and he had to consent to the abrogation of a clause in a former treaty which restrained the British Government from forming engagements with the Rajpoot States. In 1818 a treaty was made with Sindia by which the British Government received Ajmer and other districts and ceded lands of equal value. The history of Ajmer is no longer a romantic tale of sieges and battles or chivalrous deeds of valour, neither is it a tale of wrong and robbery. It is the prosaic story of a people advancing in prosperity and civilization under a settled government, and it would be impossible to exaggerate the good that has been effected in the Protected States of Rajpootana by our influence and example. When a mighty famine arose in extensive and populous provinces of our Indian Empire the chiefs of Rajpootana vied with the British Government in alleviating the sufferings of the people. Following the example set them by noble English ladies, consorts in the burdens of Empire, chiefs in whose kingdoms infanticide and suttee had prevailed for ages are building hospitals for native women, and are securing the services of lady doctors to alleviate the sufferings of the inmates of the harem.

About three miles from the Fortress-palace of Akbar stands in park-like grounds a handsome marble pile which illustrates the gulf between the suzerainty of the English and the suzerainty of the Mahratta and the Moghul. It is the Mayo College, founded by the great ruler whose name it bears, for the education of young Rajpoot princes. At a great durbar which he held for the reception of the chiefs of Rajpootana in October, 1870, Lord Mayo made a speech so illustrative of what our policy and feelings towards the nobles and the people of India should be that it cannot be too often quoted:

"I, as the representative of the Queen, have come here to tell you, as you have often been told before, that the desire of Her Majesty's Government is to secure to you and to your successors the full enjoyment of your ancient rights and the exercise of all lawful customs, and to assist you in upholding the dignity and maintaining the authority which you and your fathers have for centuries exercised in this land.

"But in order to enable us fully to carry into effect this our fixed resolve, we must receive from you hearty and cordial assistance. If we respect your rights and privileges, you should also respect the rights and regard the privileges of those who are placed beneath your care. If we support you in your power, we expect in return good government. We demand that everywhere throughout the length and breadth of Rajpootana justice and order should prevail; that every man's property should be secure; that the traveller should come and go in safety; that the cultivator should enjoy the fruits of his labour, and the trader the produce of his commerce; that you should make roads and undertake the construction of those works of irrigation which will improve the condition of the people, and swell the revenue of your States; that you should encourage education and provide for the relief of the sick.

"And now let me mention a project which I have much at heart. I desire much to invite your assistance to enable me to establish at Ajmer a school or college which should be devoted exclusively to the education of the sons of the Chiefs, Princes, and leading Thakooors of Rajpootana. It should be an institution suited to the position and rank of the boys for whose instruction it is intended, and such a system of teaching should be founded as would be best calculated to fit them for the important duties which in after-life they would be called upon to discharge. It would not be possible on this occasion to describe minutely the different features of such an institution, but I hope to communicate with you shortly on the subject; and I trust you will favour and support an attempt to give to the youth of Rajpootana instruction suitable to their high birth and position.

"Be assured that we ask you to do all this for no other but your own benefit. If we wished you to remain weak, we should say, 'Be poor, and ignorant, and disorderly.' It is because we wish you to be strong that we desire to see you rich, instructed, and well-governed. It is for such objects that the servants of the Queen rule in India; and Providence will ever sustain the rulers who govern for the people’s good.

"I am but here for a time; the able and ardent officers who surround me will, at no distant period, return to their English homes; but the power which we represent will endure for ages. Hourly is this great Empire brought nearer and nearer to the throne of our Queen. The steam vessel and the railroad enable England year by year to enfold India in a closer embrace. But the coils she seeks to entwine around her are not iron fetters, but the golden chains of affection and of peace. The hours of conquest are past; the age of improvement has begun.

"Chiefs and princes, advance in the right way, and secure to your children's children, and to future generations of your subjects, the favouring protection of a power who only seeks your good."

Thus spoke the strong and worthy representative of a Queen who during her long and illustrious reign laboured to exercise her power for the good of India, and shared in the joys and sorrows of her Indian subjects. History will record how she won their affection. The presence in that magnificent pageant on Coronation Day, of Sindia and his hereditary foes the Maharaja of Jeypore and the Regent of Jodpore, bore witness to the personal loyalty which she created among the chiefs and princes of India. After their reception at Buckingham Palace by her son, one of the most illustrious and proudest of the feudatory chiefs, struck by the splendour of the scene and the dignity and kindness of his Emperor, declared he was now proud to be a feudatory of the Empire. The frequent visits of Indian princes to England should be indeed discouraged, because they are fraught with evil to themselves and their subjects. But it might be sound policy to expect that every chief before he ascends the musnud should pay a visit to England and present his nuzzur, and receive from the hands of the Emperor the emblems of sovereignty.

The feudal castle at Ajmer, where Jehangir held his Durbar and received the feudatory princes and the Ambassador from His Majesty King James I., has long since been converted into a public office. On each side of the fine gate facing the city can be seen the windows which answer to the "Jarruco wyndow" (Audience window) where Roe found the Emperor when he went to pay his respects on the Nau-roz, or New Year's Day feast. The Emperor was busy in receiving and giving presents. What he bestowed he let down "by a silke stringe rouled on a turning instrument"; what was given him "a venerable fatt deformed ould matron" pulled up at a hole with such another

I saw first their fingers, and after laying their faces close, nowe one eye, nowe another; sometyme I could discerne the full proportions. They were indifferently white, black hayre smoothed vp; but if I had no other light, their diamonds and Pearles had sufficed to show them. When I looked vp they retyred, and were so merry that I supposed they laughed at mee." "The emperor suddenly rose and all retired to the Durbar and sat in the Carpette, attending his Commen." Not long after Jehangir appeared and descended the stairs "with such an acclamation of health to the King as would have out-cryed Cannons. At the foot of the stairs one came and buckled on his swoord and buckler, sett all ouer with great Diamondes and rubys, the belts of Gould suteable."

"Another hung on his quier with 30 arrowes and his bow in a Case, the same that was presented by the Persian Ambassa

His shash was wreathed about with a Chayne of great Pearle, rubys, and diamonds drild. About his Neck hee carried a Chaine of most excellent Pearle, three double; so great I neuer saw: at his Elbowes, Amlettes sett with diamondes; and on his wristes three rows of seuerall sorts. His handes bare, but almost on every finger a ring; his gloves, which were english, stuck under his Girdle; his Coate of Cloth of Gould without sleeues upon a fine Semian as thin as Lawne; on his feet a payre of embroidered buskinges with Pearle, the toes sharp and turning vp. Thus armd and accomodated, hee went to the Coach, which at

The Persian Ambassador presented him a horse. Next behind came three Palenkees; the Carriages and feete of on Plated with gould sett at the endes with stones and couered with Crimson velvett embroidered with Pearle, and a frengg of great Pearls hanging in ropes a foote deepe, a border about sett with rubyes and emeraldes. Next followed the English Coach newly couered and trimed rich, which hee had given the quene Normahall, who rode in yt. After them a third of this Countrie fashion, which me thought was out of Countenance; in that sate his younger sons. After followed about 20 Eliphantes royall spare for his owne ascending, so rich that in stones and furniture that they braved the sunne. Every Eliphant had diuers flages of Cloth of siluer, guilt satten, and tafteta. His Noblemen hee suffered to walke a foot, which I did to the gate and left him. His wiuies on their Eliphantes were carried like Parraquitoes half a Mile beynd him."

No gorgeous Imperial pageant now rolls down the street of Ajmer. But there are few towns in India where you can enter so into the heart of the East and feel its life about you as Ajmer, with its old houses and their carved marble balconies overhanging its narrow and tortuous bazaars, alive with many races. They come to trade, for Ajmer is an important entrepôt, and they come—Rajpoot, Jat, Mahratta, Muhammadan—to visit the shrine of the Saint Khwaja Mueyyin-ud-din Chisti, known as Khwaja Sahib, whose miracles are renowned all over India. The great Akbar once made a pilgrimage on foot to this place to implore at the saint’s tomb the blessing of male offspring. Many are the legends stated about the holy man. According to a popular tradition it was at Medina "the City" a voice came from the tomb of the Prophet calling for Mueyyin-ud-din, and directing him to go to Ajmer and convert the infidels. He obeyed the call. On reaching Ajmer he took up his abode on the hill overlooking Lake Anasagar, whose margin he found lined with idol temples. The idolaters made frequent attempts to slay him. But when they came in sight of the Saint they were rooted to the ground, and when they attempted to cry Ram, Ram, only ejaculated Rahim, Rahim.¹ They begged his forgiveness, and invited him to take up his residence in the town. He chose the site on the southern side of the city close to the wall, where the Dargah now stands. Here he lived working miracles till his death in 1235. The charm of the Dargah lies in its fine gateway, the marble courtyard glistening and sparkling in the sun, the tall trees planted around the tombs, which cast a cool and refreshing shade, and the grey mountain towering above. The marble mosque built by Shah Jehan has the radiant purity of the pearl mosque built by him at Agra. The monarch who erected the mosque at Ajmer, the pearl mosque at Agra, and the Taj Mahal, left the world richer than he found it.

¹ They tried to cry Ram, Ram, the Hindu Rama, and they were forced to cry the Muhammadan name ‘Rahim’ for the Merciful God.

JEYPORE

FROM Ajmer the open tableland spreads eastward towards Jeypore, which stands on a sandy and barren plain sixteen hundred feet above the sea, surrounded on three sides by stony hills. From this point the Aravell range no longer forms an unbroken barrier against the desert. Ajmer whispers the mediaeval enchantment of the East: Jeypore proclaims itself a prosperous modern town. It owes its political importance to being the capital of one of the two chief States of Rajpootana, and its prosperity to being a great commercial centre for the trade between Delhi and Agra and Rajpootana. Though Jeypore is a modern prosperous Hindu city, the State to which it gives its name has a respectable antiquity. The chiefs of Jeypore, claim their descent from Kash, the second son of Rama, who was the fifty-seventh of the line of Surajbans, or Sun-begotten kings, and therefore may be allowed "the boast of heraldry." Rama ruled long and gloriously in Ajodhya (the blessed) in Oude, and when the city waxed and waned the royal kinsmen went forth and carved out chiefships for themselves. When Edgar was King of all the English (A.D. 967) Dhola Rao and his Kachwahas, after many and stubborn struggles with the local chiefs, obtained a solid establishment in a territory known by the name of Dhundar from (Tod says) a sacred mount of that name situated somewhere on the western frontier of the present State. Half a century later and the Kachwa chief got possession of Amber, consecrated to Amba the Universal Mother, a flourishing town erected by the Mynas, the great, pure, unmixed race of Upper India, whose original home was in the range of hills called Kali-Kho, extending from Ajmer nearly to the Jumna. As Amber lies in a gorge of the hills, the Mynas proudly styled it Ghatta Rani, Queen of the Pass. The prosperity of the town increased with the power of her new masters, and having become their capital she gave her name to their chiefship. From the annals of Amber little fruit can be gleaned till her chiefs became intimately connected with the Moghul dynasty. The far sight of Akbar saw that the strength of the Moghul Empire could be only sustained by alliances with the princely families of the Hindus, and so bringing the Hindu States into the Imperial system. He himself had two Rajpoot queens of the houses of Jeypore and Marwar, and his eldest son, Prince Selim, afterwards Jehangir, was married to a daughter of Raja Bagwandas of Jeypore. “By what arts or influence Akbar,” says Tod, “overcame the scruples of the Cuchwaha Rajpoot we know not, unless by appealing to his avarice or ambition; but the name of Bhágwandas is execrated as the first who sullied Rajpoot purity by matrimonial alliance with the Islamite.” Maun Sing, nephew, adopted son, and successor of Bhágwandas, was one of the ablest of Akbar’s soldier statesmen. “As the Emperor’s lieutenant, he was entrusted with the most arduous duties, and added conquests to the Empire from Khoten to the ocean. Orissa was subjugated by him, Assam humbled and made tributary, and Cabul maintained in her allegiance. He held in succession the governments of Bengal and Behar, the Dekhan and Cabul.” Maun Sing did much for his own capital, and commenced the palace, uniting it to the feudal castle of the former kings, some portions of which may still be seen.

He was succeeded by two unworthy successors, debauchees who reigned but did not govern. The influence of Jeypore declined, and the princes of Jodpoor took the lead in the Imperial Court. Then, at the instigation of the celebrated Joda Bae, daughter of the Raja of Bikaner, Jey Sing, a grand-nephew of Maun, was raised by Jehangir to the throne of Amber. The chronicle relates that “the succession was settled by the Emperor and the Rajpootni in a conference at the balcony of the seraglio, where the Emperor saluted the youth below as Raja of Amber, and commanded him to make his salaam to Joda Bae, as the source of this honour. But the customs of Rajwarra could not be broken; it was contrary to etiquette for a Rajpoot chief to salaam, and he replied, ‘I will do this to any lady of your Majesty’s family, but not to Joda Bae’; upon which she good-naturedly laughed, and called out, ‘It matters not; I give you the Raj of Amber.’” The chivalrous Jey Sing or Mirza Raja, the title by which he is best known, was qualified to restore and invigorate a kingdom. During his reign Amber reached the zenith of its prosperity and magnificence. By the construction of a dam he had formed the beautiful lake of Tal Koutora, and he adorned the royal city with luxurious gardens. He added to the palace which Maun Sing began the Jey Mandir, the Diwan-i-Khas, and several other noble buildings, and he diligently strengthened it by enclosing it within a wall. To the Empire he also rendered great service. Aurangzeb bestowed on him the munsub, or command of seven thousand horse, and he led many a campaign at the head of his valiant tribesmen. Aurangzeb sent him to crush the upstart Deccan robber Shivaji, who defied the armies of the Moghul. After a vigorous campaign of some months Mirza Raja brought the great Mahratta leader to bay at the Fort of Purandhar. Shivaji made several ineffectual sorties, and Jey Sing opening negotiations, a treaty was ratified.

“It was stipulated that Shivaji with his son Sambhaji should go and pay his respects to the kings at Delhi, and that Mirza Raja's son, Ram Sing, should accompany him, and introduce him to the King, and obtain for Shivaji the royal pardon. When they parted Mirza Raja presented Shivaji with many valuable presents."
JEYPORE

Shivaji was coldly received by Aurangzeb, and he would have been murdered if Jey Sing's son had not discovered the plot. Three years later (1608) Jey Sing died. Tod states he was poisoned at the instigation of Aurangzeb, whose jealousy and resentment he had aroused. The chronicle says:

"He had twenty-two thousand Rajpoot cavalry at his disposal, and twenty-two great vassal chiefs who commanded under him; that he would sit with them in durbar, holding two glasses, one of which he called Delhi, the other Satarra, and dashing one to the ground, would exclaim, there goes Satarra, the fate of Delhi is in my right hand, and this with like facility I can cast away."

"These vaunts reaching the Emperor's ear, he had recourse to the same diabolical expedient which ruined Marwar, of making a son assassin of his father. He promised the succession to the Gadi of Amber to Keerut Sing, younger son of the Raja, to the prejudice of his elder brother, Ram Sing, if he effected the horrible deed. The wretch, having perpetrated the crime by mixing poison in his father's opium, returned to claim the investiture, but the King only gave him the district of Kamah. From this period, says the chronicle, Amber declined."

Thirty years after the death of Mirza Raja, Jey Sing the Second, better known as Siwai Jey Sing, mounted the musnud. The title Siwai, which his descendants adopt to this day, was given him by the Moghul Emperor. "The word means one and a quarter, and is supposed to measure the superiority of the bearer to all contemporaries, whom the unit signifies.” In vulgar English, Jey Sing was considered head and shoulders above the rest. He showed marked capacity as a statesman and legislator, and to his capacity as an engineer and architect the city he founded bears testimony. Of his proficiency in mathematics and astronomy men of science of Western reputation have borne witness. “He had erected observatories, with instruments of his own invention, at Delhi, Jeipoor, Oojiein, Benares, and Mathura upon a scale of Asiatic grandeur; and their results were so correct as to astonish the most learned. He had previously used such instruments as those of Ulug Beg (the Royal astronomer of Samarcan), which failed to answer his expectations. From the observations of seven years at the various observatories he constructed a set of tables. While thus engaged he learned through a Portuguese missionary, Padre Manuel, the progress which his favourite pursuit was making in Portugal, and he sent ‘several skilful persons along with him’ to the Court of Emanuel. The King of Portugal despatched Xavier de Silva, who communicated to the Rajpoot the tables of De la Hire.” Jey Sing writes:

“On examining and comparing the calculations of these tables with actual observation it appeared there was an error in the former, in assigning the moon’s place, of half a degree; although the error in the other planets was not so great, yet the times of solar and lunar eclipses he” (Jey Sing speaks of himself in the third person) “found to come out later or earlier than the truth by the fourth part of a ghurry, or fifteen puls (six minutes of time).”

Jey Sing had Euclid’s Elements, the treatises on plane and spherical trigonometry, and Napier on the construction and use of logarithms, to be translated into Sanskrit; he also collated for himself a table of stars, which he called Tij Muhammad Shahi, the preface of which he thus opens:

“Let us devote ourselves at the altar of the King of kings, hallowed be His name! in the book of register of whose power the lofty orbs of heaven are only a few leaves; and the stars, and that heavenly courser the sun, small pieces of money, in the treasury of the Empire of the most High.”

From inability to comprehend the all-encompassing beneficence of His power, Hipparchus is an ignorant clown who wrings the hand of vexation; and in the contemplation of his exalted majesty, Ptolemy is a bat, who can never arrive at the sun of truth; the demonstrations of Euclid are an imperfect sketch of the forms of His contrivance.

“But since the well-wisher of the works of creation, and the admiring spectator of the works of infinite wisdom, Siwai Jey Sing, from the first dawning of reason in his mind, and during its progress towards maturity, was entirely devoted to the study of mathematical science, and the bent of his mind was constantly directed to the solution of its most difficult problems; by the aid of the Supreme Author he obtained a thorough knowledge of its principles and rules, etc.”

After entering the gates of the palace, on the right lies a cluster of stone buildings containing the instruments designed by the Royal mathematician. The present Maharaja has had the Kantra or Observatory restored, so it now stands as it did in the days of his illustrious predecessor. It was Jey Sing’s coadjutor in science and history, Vedayadhar, a Jain of Bengal, who designed his new capital for him. “Jeypore,” says Tod, “is the only city in India built upon a regular plan, with streets bisecting each other at right angles.” It is the regularity of the plan of the city, the straight streets, the houses all built after the same pattern, which deprive it of one of the mystic charms of the East. The houses, all of a pale pink or violet colour, ornamented with paintings, look well in the bright sunshine, but we miss the gloom and shadow, the mystery and romance of an

CITIES OF INDIA

Oriental city. The wide spaces, filled with a white and red crowd, present a gay scene, but it is merely spectacular. The Rajpoot cavaliers on their fine horses, the bullock carts, the palanquins, the camels, the donkeys, the richly caparisoned elephants making their way through the throng, merely seem to pass over a stage. The houses, pierced with small windows filled in with slabs of perforated stone, are mere scenery, mud walls made to look like houses, and painted pink. Jeypore is, as André Chevrillon says, "India of novels and the opera, fairy-like and incredible." The fairy-land of the Parisian opera, but not of the Arabian Nights.

The Maharaja's palace, surrounded by a lofty wall built by Jey Sing, stands on a large open space in the centre of the town. The only portion visible from the streets is a building "of a singularly vivid rose-colour, rising in the form of a pyramid, bristling with a nine-storied façade, composed of a hundred bell-turrets and sixty-five projecting windows, adorned with colonnettes and balconies, pierced in open-work with countless flowers cut out in the stone; a vapoury, impossible construction. This is the palace of the Wind—the palace of the Wind. How enchanting the name." The palace is, however, a mere mask of stucco, and it is more fantastic than beautiful. The Chandra Mahal, which forms the centre of the principal palace, is also a pyramidal building seven stories high, but the architecture is of a far higher order than that of the Hall of the Winds. It overlooks the Royal gardens, which are extensive, and in their way extremely beautiful, full of fountains, mango and orange trees, and flowering shrubs. "The garden," says Bishop Heber, whose comparisons are always happy, "is surrounded by a high embattled wall, having a terrace at the top like that of Chester, and beneath it a common passage (as one of the Ministers of State who accompanied me told me) for the Zenanah to walk in." The Diwan-i-Khas, or Hall of Audience, which occupies the ground floor of the
JEYPORE

Chandra Mahal, is "a noble open pavilion, with marble pillars, richly carved, rather inferior in size, but in other respects fully equal to the Hall of Audience at Delhi." Here the Bishop and the Resident "sat cross-legged on the carpet, there being no chairs, and we kept our hats on." The Maharaja was a minor, and the Government was at the time being conducted under the Regency of his mother—whose vices matched those of Theodora. The Bishop writes: "I was mortified to find that the rannee never appeared even behind the purdah, though we were told she was looking through a latticed window at some distance in front." "After the usual exchange of compliments," says the Bishop, "some very common-looking shawls, a turban, necklace, etc., were brought in as presents from the rannee to me, which were followed by two horses and an elephant, of which she also requested my acceptance." When the audience was over the Bishop and the Resident mounted their elephants and returned to the Residency, "the rannee's presents going before us." The Bishop, when he reached camp, had the old warning brought home to him, "Put not your trust in princes." "Of these presents it appeared that the elephant was lame, and so vicious that few people ventured to go near him. One of the horses was a very pretty black, but he also turned out as lame as a cat, while the other horse was in a poor condition, and at least, as my people declared, thirty years old." Eight years after Heber's visit (1825) the Rani died, and two years later the young Maharaja Jey Sing. It was supposed that he was poisoned by one Jota Rama, the paramour of the late Queen. On the death of the Maharaja the Agent of the Governor-General proceeded to Jeypore, which was a scene of corruption and misgovernment, and assumed the guardianship of the infant heir. The strong measures which he adopted led to the formation of a conspiracy by Jota Ram. "The Agent's life was attempted, and his Assistant was murdered.” ¹ The murderers were seized and executed by order of the Native Minister. A Council of Regency, consisting of five of the principal nobles, was formed, under the superintendence of a political agent, and, as has been the case with other Native States under similar circumstances, Jeypore was delivered from ruin and anarchy. “The army was reduced, every branch of the administration was reformed, and suttee, slavery, and infanticide were prohibited.” Maharajah Ram Sing, when he was installed ruler, found a well-governed prosperous State, and he proved himself a capable administrator. He did good service during the mutinies, for which he received a grant of land and also the privilege of adoption. He took advantage of this privilege shortly before his death, and adopted a young relative belonging to a distant branch (the present Maharaja), who was a poor village lad of the true blood. Siwai Madhao Sing, the hundred and fortieth descendant in a direct line from Rama, proud of his descent, proud of his country, of her ancient customs and her ancient faith, has shown that the Rajpoot has not lost his capacity for government. His Royal city has public institutions which would do credit to any Western capital. The public garden of Jeypore has a good title to be considered one of the finest in India. Here are well-kept grass plots, with beds planted with ferns and roses, and shrubberies bright with sky-blue and blood-red flowers. In the centre of the garden stands the Albert Hall, whose foundation was laid by the King-Emperor when he visited the city as Prince of Wales. On the rocky slope of a hill that bears the name of Nahargarh (“The Tiger’s Stronghold”) can be seen the word Welcome in gigantic white letters, another memento of his visit. The Albert Hall contains a large Durbar hall, and one of the best arranged museums in India. As we strolled through it we came upon an interesting group. Three or four Rajpoots from the wilds, with their women, whose faces were veiled, listening with rapt attention to a guide who was dilating on the imitations of the frescoes in the Ajanta caves. The silks and carpets, the porcelain and clay vessels, are well worth a close study, and it is instructive to go from the museum to the School of Art and compare the work which is being done with the work of the past. The pencil drawings are very nice, the inlaid work is very pretty, but something has gone from the beauty, an indescribable something, the soul of the artist. A School of Art does the same kind and amount of good as the purely external literary English education at the Maharaja's College, and it also works as much mischief.
JEYPORE

It was refreshing to leave modern prosperous Jeypore and spend a day at Amber, amidst all "the venerable pageantry of time." It was a soft, cool morning in February when we drove from the Residency to the old capital. The pavement was early alive with men performing their ablutions, who filled the atmosphere with their gurgles as they cleaned their teeth with a piece of stick, as their forefathers had done some centuries before gas was introduced into Jeypore. Emerging from the north-east gate, we found ourselves on the white sandy road running through luxurious gardens and garden houses, the trees glittering with their broad leaves in the sun; the parrots all awake, chirping, screaming, flashing from branch to branch, peacocks, blue and white, sunning their tails on the walls. Then we come to a large lake covered with waterfowl, and alligators basking in the sun on the bank. Horrid, evil-looking monsters, with the hungry impudent stare of the Yogis (mendicants) who sit around the tombs and ruined houses. The alligators are also protected by the pious, and they increase and multiply because no one is allowed under pain of severe punishment to hurt or disturb them. In Jeypore, with its gas and its

English college, zoaltry still prevails, and the alligator is one of the monsters worshipped. It is sacred to Kamadeva, Love. On the bank of the lake the road passes through an ancient gateway in an embattled wall, which connects the two hills that enclose the valley of Amber. Here we find the elephants sent by the Maharaja to complete our journey, for the road now becomes too steep for carriages. The sight of the huge monster kneeling at the word of his driver (Mahaut) has long ceased to be novel, but will never cease to delight and surprise. When loaded he rose, and rolled slowly up the steep hill, like some ungainly, fat dame. On reaching the summit we passed through another gateway, and below us lay a deep glen, where by the margin of a small lake, a blur of hot colour, sleeps the ancient capital of Amber, a city of ancient temples and ruined palaces, a city of the dead. The crests of the hills on either side are glorified with castles built of pink sandstone, the relics of old Rajpoot story. Above the lake on its western side rises the old fortified palaces, whose white and yellow façade is broken by balconies and verandahs. The elephant rolled through a winding street of ruined houses and miserable huts till a sloped paved ascent leading to the palace was reached. Guarded on either side by embattled ramparts, and having at every turn a massive red sandstone gateway, it is a fitting entrance to the home of a Rajpoot chief.

Having got through the last handsome gateway, we found ourselves in a large quadrangle surrounded by great blocks of buildings formerly used as barracks and stables. Here we alighted. To be accurate, we had alighted two miles before, for we had discovered that the back of an elephant is, like the sea, not our natural home. Mounting a long flight of steps and passing through another gateway ornamented with brilliant frescoes, we reached a courtyard, the Court of Honour, paved with red and white sandstone. At one end rises the Diwan-i-Khas, a noble hall of audience. "A double row of columns, supporting a massive entablature, forms three sides of the hall, which is roofed in by a vaulted and very lofty ceiling of great solidity; the fourth side, which is walled up, facing the lake. The building is therefore in reality only a kiosk on a very large scale, and is perfectly open to the air. The hall is paved with marble, inlaid with colours, and a platform of white marble erected at one extremity, serves as a throne. The first row of columns are of red sandstone, with capitals of great beauty, on which elephants are sculptured, supporting with their trunks the sloping stone roof which descends from the cornice. The shafts of these columns are covered with a layer of smooth white stucco, which hides the magnificent sculpture. It appears that no sooner had Mirza completed the Diwan-i-Khas than it came to the ears of the Emperor Jehanghir, that his vassal had surpassed him in magnificence, and that this last great work quite eclipsed all the marvels of the Imperial city; the columns of red sandstone having been particularly noticed as sculptured with exquisite taste and elaborate detail. In a fit of jealousy the Emperor commanded that this masterpiece should be thrown down, and sent commissioners to Amber charged with the execution of this order; whereupon the Mirza, in order to save the structure, had the columns plastered over with stucco, so that the messengers from Agra should have to acknowledge to the Emperor that the magnificence, which had been so much talked of, was after all pure invention. Since then his apathetic successors have neglected to bring to light this splendid work; and it is only by knocking off some of the plaster that one can get a glimpse of the sculptures, which are perfect as on the day they were carved."  At the other end of the courtyard is the abode of the King, with its magnificent gateway, covered with mosaics and delicate paintings. The marble frameworks of the windows are carved out of single slabs, and vie with those of Ahmedabad in delicacy

and beauty. Passing through the Royal portal, we entered a court surrounded by palaces in the centre of which is a fragrant garden. On one side of the garden there is the Jey Mandir, the marble pavilion built by the great Jey Sing. The interior is divided into three great saloons, which are inlaid from the ceiling to the floor with mosaics in various colours and pieces of looking-glass, evidence of the taste of the eighteenth century. It is a creature of Oriental gorgeousness marred by a touch of western influence. Above the Hall of Victory is a Jas Mandir, or Alcove of Delight, a marble kiosk with three fine apartments ornamented in the same style as, but in better taste than those on the ground floor. On one side, overlooking the precipice, are large windows with delicate marble trellis-work, through which the queens had broken glimpses of wild and magnificent nature; on the other side is a marble terrace overlooking an Elysian garden of the citron, orange, and pomegranate.

JEYPORE

From a balcony may be enjoyed one of the most striking prospects that can be conceived, the rugged green valley, the silver lake reflecting the castles and ruined palaces, the wild waste of sand, and the red hills stretching away to the north. The amber tints of the sky, the dark brown of the ruins, the pale grey shadows of the hills, make the whole effect as unreal as "the light that never shone on sea or land." On the other side of the Jey Mandir is the Sukh Nawas, or Hall of Pleasure, famous for its painting of a grove, and a channel for a rivulet to run through the apartments. It was a cool retreat for an Oriental monarch, but it lacks the true glory and loveliness of Eastern art. The simplicity and princely air of the Zenana is more in keeping with the proud Rajpoot and his queens, through whose veins love, passion, courage, and the stern justice of revenge throbbed and burnt. The harem was originally a sanctuary; it was prohibited to strangers, not because women were considered unworthy of confidence, but on account of the sacredness with which custom and manners invested them. European writers are apt to judge the harem by the standard of the Moghul Emperor's seraglio. Making the worst of this, however, yet Anrangzeb was better than his contemporary Louis XIV. If we judge from the Rajpoot bards, women could not have been held in slight esteem. The princess of Canouj, who was carried off by the Chohan Emperor of Delhi, is the Helen of Rajpootana. The Rajpoot bard, like Homer, separates her from her faults, and a noble woman remains. When the Muslim invades the land, she breaks the bonds of pleasure and passion, and tells her lover, "Victory and fame to my lord! Oh Sun of the Chohans! in glory, or in pleasure, who has tasted so deeply as you? To die is the destiny not only of man, but of the gods: all desire to throw off the old garment; but to die well is to live for ever. Think not of self, but of immortality; let your sword divide your foe, and I will be your ardhanga (half-body) hereafter." When the Rajpoot's hosts were ranged to advance against the Islamite, Sunjogta armed her husband. "In vain she sought the rings of his corslet; her eyes were fixed on the face of the Chohan, as those of the famished wretch who finds a piece of gold. The sound of the drum reached the ear of the Chohan; it was as that of a death-knell on that of Sunjogta: and as he left her to head Delhi's heroes she vowed that henceforward water only should sustain her! 'I shall see him again in the region of Surya, but never more in Yoginipoor (Delhi).’ Her prediction was fulfilled; her lord was routed, made captive, and slain; and, faithful to her vow, she mounted the funeral pyre.' By this act of faith the Sati not only made atonement for the sins of her husband and secured the remission of her own, but had the joyful assurance of reunion to the object whose beatitude she procured. A Princess of Haravati, one of the queens of the illustrious Jey Sing, is the Rajpoot conception of true female modesty. Her manners and garb, in accord with the simplicity of her provincial capital, subjected her to the badinage of the more refined court of Amber, whose ladies had added the Imperial costume to their own native dress. "One day, being alone with the prince, he began playfully to contrast the sweeping jupe of Kotah with the more scanty robe of the belles of his own capital; and, taking up a pair of scissors, said he would reduce it to an equality with the latter. Offended at such levity, she seized his sword, and assuming a threatening attitude said, 'that in the house to which she had the honour to belong they were not habituated to jests of this nature; that mutual respect was the guardian not only of happiness, but of virtue'; and she assured him that if he ever again so insulted her, he would find that the daughter of Kotah could use a sword more effectively than the prince of Amber the scissors." The Queen of Ganore is as grand as Lucretia. After having defended five fortresses against the foe, she retreated to her last stronghold on the Nerbudda River. She had scarcely left the boat when the assailants arrived in pursuit. The garrison were few in number, and the fortress was soon in possession of the enemy. The fame of the radiant beauty of the Queen of Ganore had reached the Muslim conqueror, and he begged her to reign over the fortress and himself. Denial was useless. The Khan awaited her reply in the hall below. "She sent a message of assent, with a complimentary reflection on his gallant conduct and determination of pursuit, adding that he merited her hand for his bravery, and might prepare for the nuptials, which should be celebrated on the terrace of the palace. She demanded two hours for unmolested preparation, that she might appear in appropriate attire, and with the distinction her own and his rank demanded." The two hours sped away. The Khan was summoned to the terrace.

"Robed in the marriage garb presented to him by the Queen, with a necklace and aigrette of superb jewels from the coffers of Ganore, he hastened to obey the mandate, and found that fame had not done justice to her charms. He was desired to be seated, and in conversation full of rapture on his side, hours were as minutes while he gazed on the beauty of the Queen. But presently his countenance fell—he complained of heat; punkas and water were brought, but they availed him not, and he began to tear the bridal garments from his frame, when the Queen thus addressed him: 'Know, Khan, that your last hour is come; our wedding and our death shall be sealed together. The vestments which cover you are poisoned; you had left me no other expedient to escape pollution.' While all were horror-struck by this declaration, she sprung from the battlements into the flood beneath. The Khan died in extreme torture, and was buried on the road to Bhopal."

An ancient pagan scene, yet not without a charm even to the modern Christian world. And now, as the sun threw a violet haze over the mountains, we descended the hill, and cast a last look on the massive walls, the fairy kiosks, the slender balconies of the Royal Fortress, a fit home for knights of old.

DELHI

DELHI is the Empress of Indian cities. She has often been sacked and left naked and desolate. But she could not be despoiled of the incomparable situation which marks her for the metropolis of a great Empire. Standing on her high battlements, the eye can sweep over a wide expanse of yellow country scarred by ravines and dotted with trees and gardens till it reaches a long range of barren hills bathed in orange and lilac. Scattered over this wild stretch of land are surviving ruins, remnants of mighty edifices, tombs of warriors and saints, which convey a more impressive sense of magnificence than Imperial Rome. They are memorials not of a single city but of supplanted nations. Eight centuries before the Latins settled on the plains of Latium and Campania a band of Aryans drove from here aboriginal savages and founded on the left bank of the Jumna the city of Indrapastha, which grew into a mighty kingdom. Then the Muslim appeared on the scenes, and Hindu civilization disappeared in smoke and ruin, and of all that it contained there is nothing left but an iron pillar which records that Raja Dhava, who erected it, "obtained with his own arm an undivided sovereignty on the earth for a long period." An old prophecy declared that the Hindu sovereigns should endure as long as the pillar stood. Quamdiu stabit Colysceus stabit et Roma, quando cadit Colysceus cadit Roma—

"While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand,
When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall."

CITIES OF INDIA

When Delhi first became the capital of a Muhammadan Empire (1206) the founder Kutb-ud-Din (the Pole-star of religion), originally a Turki slave, was told the prophecy, but he showed his contempt for it by allowing the pillar to remain, for it was more gratifying to the pride of the Muslim conqueror to allow the idolater’s pillar to stand in the courtyard of a great mosque built with the spoils of innumerable Hindu shrines. The great mosque is now in ruins, but the remaining arches, with their granite pillars, covered with inscriptions in the florid Cufic character, Bishop Heber considered to be “as fine in their way as any of the details of York Minster.” Ibn Batuta, the Tangier traveller who saw the mosque little more than a century after its erection, describes it as having no equal either for beauty or extent. The Turki slave, not contented with erecting a mosque from the materials of the infidel temples, determined to build a tower which should mark the triumph of Islam over the foul worship thatprevailed in them, and from whose summit the Faithful should hear the Muezzins (criers) proclaim the Ezan or public invitation to prayer in the name of God and His prophet. Far over the ruins of Delhi soars the tapering shaft which bears his name. By sublime massiveness and subtle alterations of proportion the architect has created a transcendent building. The purplish red of the sandstone at the base is finely modulated through a pale pink in the second story to a dark orange at the summit, which harmonizes with the blue of an Indian sky. Dark bands of Arabic writing round the three lower stories contrast with the purple red. The Hindus whom the Muslim conquerors employed to erect and embellish their buildings wrought cunningly and with knowledge. His great aim, as Ram Raz points out in his work on Hindu architecture, was to produce beauty by geometrical proportion. The height of the column (238 feet 1 inch) is exactly five times the diameter, and that of the lower story twice the diameter. The plinth is a polygon of twenty sides: the basement story has the same number of faces formed into convex flutes which are alternately angular and semicircular, the next has semicircular flutes, and in the third they are all angular. Then rises a plain story, and above it soars a partially fluted story, whose shaft is adorned with bands of marble and red sandstone. A bold projecting balcony, richly ornamented, runs round each story and affords relief to the eye. After six centuries the column stands as fresh as on the day it was finished.

In Delhi we have the martial violence and religious sentiment of Muhammadanism raised to the elevation of fine art. Dark massive mausoleums scattered over the plain bear testimony to the manly vigour of the Afghan rulers, and convey the expression of authority and power appropriate to the puritanical spirit which enabled the followers of the Man of Mecca to spread their victorious arms over the world. The stately palaces and jewelled shrines within the walls of the city mark the decline of that spirit and the influence of wealth, luxury, and climate on the Empire founded by the brilliant audacity and warlike skill of Zaher ud din Muhammad (Light of the Faith), better known by his Tartar sobriquet of Baber (the Lion). The blood of conquerors ran in his veins. He was the sixth in descent from Tamerlane, and his mother was a Moghul of the race of Chengiz Khan. It was not until after four unsuccessful expeditions (1519–1526) into India that he won, on the fateful field of Paniput, situated fifty miles from Delhi, the bloody and decisive victory which gave him a firm footing in Hindustan. Baber, in his authentic memoirs, a book full of human interest and of great historical importance, writes: "I placed my foot in the stirrup of recollection, and my hands on the reins of confidence in God, and I marched against the possessions of the throne of Delhi and the dominions of Hindusthan, whose army was said to amount to 100,000 foot, with more than 1,000 elephants.” “The Most High God,” he adds, “did not suffer the hardships that I had undergone to be thrown away, but defeated my formidable enemy, and made me conqueror of this noble country.”

Baber’s wide dominions were divided between his two eldest sons: Camran received Afghanistan and the whole of the Punjab; and Humayun, the eldest, became the second Moghul Emperor. Nine years after his succession, he was driven from the Imperial throne by the Afghan of the tribe of Sur, called Shir Khan (“Lion-lord,” from having killed a tiger by a single blow of his sabre). After sixteen years of privation and suffering, Humayun entered Delhi in triumph, and once again was sovereign of Hindustan. He did not long enjoy his prosperity. The year after regaining his throne, as he was descending some steps, his foot slipped, and he fell headlong to the bottom. He was carried into his palace, where, after lingering for four days, he expired.

DELHI

Humayun was buried on the banks of the Jumna, and his widow and son, the Great Akbar, erected over his remains a noble tomb, which for chastity of design and delicacy of execution has never been surpassed. On a lofty square platform of red stone, adorned with arches, rises an octagonal mass of white marble and rose-coloured sandstone, crowned by a marble dome of the perfect Persian shape which forms so conspicuous a feature in all the Moghul buildings. At each of the four corners rises a superb arch about fifty feet high; and as the shaft or cylinder on which a dome rises is never a pleasing feature, the cunning architect raised the wall about fourteen feet above the arch, and destroyed its monotony by minaret and pinnacle. No man better understood than the Eastern architect that "change or variety is as much a necessity to the human heart and brain in buildings as in books," and he therefore did not continue the high wall, but placed at each corner a small pavilion with a marble dome. In the northern arch of the building is a door which admits the visitor into the room containing a marble tomb. It is only a cenotaph, for in the corresponding room below lie the remains of Humayun, his widow, his infant daughter, and some of his descendants. Here the last Moghul Emperor had a humble grave prepared for himself. But he was not destined to occupy it. A quiet, reflective man, fond of letters, and endowed with some of the ability of Baber and Akbar, he had none of the energy and activity of his ancestors. He was stricken in age when the insurgent troopers rode into Delhi from Meerut on May 11, 1857, and, of all men, least fitted to deal with a crisis. He became a mere puppet in the hands of the mutineers, and when the British troops stormed the walls of his city the old Emperor fled to the Imperial mausoleum of his ancestors. He was pursued, and "the trembling old creature put the sword he had with him into the powerful hands of Hodson." Thus the last descendant of the house of Timur gave up his arms to an English subaltern, and was led away captive to await his trial. He was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to transportation for life. On November 7, 1862, died in prison at Rangoon the last of the Great Moghuls.

art can be. The whole building is a fine example of the chaste beauty of Moghul architecture before luxury destroyed both its purity and dignity. Not far from the Chausat Khambah is the Mausoleum of Safdar Jung, which is a striking illustration of the rapid decline of Moghul art. It is not unlike that of Humayun, but with all the vigour and freshness departed, and the decoration lacks the patient skill and crispness of the ornamentation of the earlier buildings. The mausoleum contains a handsome marble sarcophagus, but in a vault beneath, under a simple mound of earth, lies the body of him who bore the proud title of “Piercer of battle ranks.” The inscription at the head informs us, “However great and pompous man may be in the presence of his fellow-men, he is small and humble before God.” The sentiment of humility in the sight of God expressed on the Moghul tombs seems inconsistent with the proud sepulchres they built for themselves. But the Mussulman’s tomb was his castle and his home. Outside the walls of a city he chose a piece of land, which he surrounded with a strong wall and one or more noble gateways, with rooms for residence. In the centre of a garden planted with cypresses and fruit-trees, on a lofty terrace, he erected a square or octagonal building covered by a dome, which was the festal hall. When death came and put an end to mirth, the founder knew that his pleasure-house would not descend to his heirs but be seized by the sovereign. No Muslim would, however, desecrate a cemetery. He therefore ordered his remains to be buried in the garden he loved, and by his side they laid his favourite wife. The proud dwelling was handed over to the care of a few priests, the garden fell into decay, and the place became the abode of “eloquent, just and mighty Death,” who “hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of men, and covered it all over with these two narrow words Hic jacet.”
DELHI

During the reign of the first three Emperors, Agra was the capital of the Moghul Empire, but Shah Jehan transferred the seat of government to Delhi. He was a contemporary of our first Charles, and the time when the English people were struggling both in Parliament and on the battlefield for constitutional government was the golden age of Moghul rule. Shah Jehan governed his vast dominion, which extended from Bengal to the borders of Persia, with ability, humanity, and justice. The native historians of these times state that, although Akbar was pre-eminent as a conqueror and a law-giver, yet for the order and arrangement of his territory and finance no prince ever reigned in India that could be compared to Shah Jehan. Travellers from the far West have recorded the splendour of his court, his peacock throne—which the practised eye of European lapidaries valued at six millions of English money—his elephants and horses with their trappings of silver and gold. But Shah Jehan's greatest splendour was shown in the magnificent fabrics of marble and stone which he caused to be erected. In the centre of Delhi and on the highest eminence he had built the Jumma Musjid, or Great Mosque. Five thousand workmen were daily employed on it for six years, and it was not finally finished till the very year the royal founder was deposed from the Imperial throne. A noble flight of steps leads to a handsome gateway of red sandstone, passing through which one enters a vast platform surrounded by high walls broken by two graceful gateways, and containing cloisters for pilgrims. Facing the Eastern gateway on the Western side (for the follower of the Prophet must look towards Mecca when he worships) rises the Mosque, with its grand central arch flanked on either side by five of small dimensions. Above all rise three fine domes of white marble striped with black, and at each angle towering in the air stands a gigantic minaret composed of alternate stripes of marble and red sandstone, from whence the Muezzins call the faithful to prayers. In the centre of the quadrangle is a marble reservoir of water in which three fountains play. Round it are groups of figures performing their ablutions before joining in the evening worship, for with the Muhammadans, as Gibbon notes, cleanliness is the secret of prayer, and the frequent lustrations of the hands, the face, and the body is solemnly enjoined by the Koran. Squatted below the arcades are old moulvies with flowing beards, teaching their scholars the Koran. A Muhammadan friend introduced me to a teacher renowned for his knowledge of history, and we conversed about rare old manuscripts and the Great Moghuls. History comes home to you in the city in which it was created; and to hear the old scholar talk with pride and dignity of the Moghuls amidst the monuments of their glory and the witnesses of their fall, touched us with a profound pathos. The conversation was interrupted by the Muezzins' shrill call to prayer. From all parts of the square men hastened to the Mosque, and, as the old teacher bade me farewell, I quoted to him the words of the Prophet, "Masjids are the gardens of Paradise, and the praises of God the fruit thereof." And we watched below those enormous white rows of figures rise and fall as one man, as they praised the Lord.

Opposite the Great Mosque is the palace built by Shah Jehan, which was the home and abode of the Moghul Cæsars. Surrounded by a lofty granite wall with frowning battlements, it was a residence worthy of the descendants of the immortal Timur. The entrance was through a fine vestibule. "It consists," says Heber, "not merely of a splendid Gothic arch in the centre of the great gate-tower, but after that of a long vaulted aisle like that of a Gothic cathedral with a small octagonal court in the centre, all of granite, and all finely carved with inscriptions from the Koran and with flowers." A long fine red sandstone arcade is all that now remains of the old entrance to the palace. The hall opened into a large courtyard, from which a great bazaar extended right and left, where sat and worked the royal manufacturers,—"goldsmiths, picture drawers, workmen in lace and workmen in silk and purple-gold, and in all those sorts of fine cloth of which they make turbans, girdles with golden flowers, and those drawers of ladies that are so fine and delicate." Passing through a great gate, over which was the Nobutkhana or Music Hall, the visitor entered the great court of the palace, in which "there is a great and stately hall with many ranks of pillars, high raised, very airy, open on three sides looking on to the court, and having its pillars and ground painted and gilded. In the midst of the walls which separate this hall from the Seraglio, there is an opening or kind of great window, high and large, and so high that a man cannot reach to it from below with his hand. There it is where the King every day about noon giveth a general audience to all; which is the reason that this great hall is called Am-kas, that is, place of audience or a place of meeting common to great and small." François Bernier, who was Court Physician to the Moghul Emperor towards the beginning of Aurangzeb's long reign (1658-1707), gives us a striking picture of the Am-kas as he saw it at certain festivals of the year.

"The King appeared upon his throne, splendidly appareled. His vest was of white satin, flowered and raised with a very fine embroidery of gold and silk. His turban was of cloth-of-gold, having a fowl wrought upon it like a heron, whose foot was covered with diamonds of an extraordinary bigness and price, with a great Oriental topaz, which may be said to be matchless, shining like a little sun. A collar of long pearls hung about his neck down to his stomach, after the manner that some heathens wear here their great beads. His throne was supported by six high pillars or feet said to be of massive gold set with rubies, emeralds and diamonds. Beneath the throne there appear the great nobles, in splendid apparel, standing upon a raised ground covered with a great canopy of purpled gold with great golden fringes and enclosed by a silver baliste. The pillars of the hall were hung with tapestries of purpled gold having the ground of gold; and for the roof of the hall there was nothing but great canopies of flowered satin fastened with red-silken cords that had big tufts of silk mixed with threads of gold hanging on them. Below there was nothing to be seen but great silken tapestries, very rich, of an extraordinary length and breadth."

The glory has departed from the Diwan-i-Am, but the pillars of marble inlaid with mosaic work which supported the marble canopy above the throne still remain to please the eye of the traveller. A little behind the Great Hall of Audience, separated from it by a garden gay with flowering shrubs, rises an airy pile of white marble overlooking the broad Jumna. It is the Diwan-i-Khas, or private Hall of Audience, world-renowned on account of the inscription
CITIES OF INDIA

which in letters of gold upon a ground of white marble ran round the cornice: "Agar Firdaus rue zamin ast—hamīn ast to, hamīn ast to, hamīn ast (If there is a paradise on earth it is this, it is this, it is this)." The whole work is a masterpiece of refined fancy. On a marble platform rises a marble pavilion, whose flat-coned roof is supported by arches resting on a double row of marble pillars. The inner face of the arches, and the spandrels, and the pilasters which support them, are covered with flowers and foliage of delicate design and dainty execution, created in green serpentine, blue, lapis lazuli red and purple porphyry. The Moghul realized the prophecy, "I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones." On that hall the artist Austin de Bordeaux concentrated all his powers of modulation and lavished the wealth of an Empire. The ceiling was of wood, painted red and richly decorated with gold; it was also formerly encrusted with a rich silver foliage inlaid with gold. Tavernier, the French jeweller, valued it at twenty-seven million francs. In the centre of the pillared terrace was the Emperor’s judgment-seat, hewn out of a solid block of natural crystal about “eighteen inches high and four feet in diameter”; and in front of it three jets of clear water were continually kept playing. On state occasions His Majesty used the famous peacock throne. "so called from its having the figures of two peacocks standing behind it, their tails being expanded and the whole so inlaid with sapphires, rubies, emeralds, pearls and other precious stones of appropriate colours, as to represent life. The throne itself was six feet long by five feet broad; it stood on six massive feet, which with the body were of solid gold inlaid with rubies, emeralds, and diamonds. It was surmounted by a canopy of gold, supported by twelve pillars, all richly emblazoned with costly gems, and a fringe of pearls ornamented the borders of the canopy. Between the two peacocks stood the figure of a parrot of the ordinary size, said to have been carved out of a single emerald.” The peacock and parrot, Bernier states, were made “by a workman of astonishing powers, a Frenchman by birth, who after defrauding several of the Princes of Europe by means of false gems, which he fabricated with peculiar skill, sought refuge in the Great Moghul’s court, where he made his fortune.”

In a small court leading from the quadrangle in which the Diwan-i-Khas stands is the Emperor’s private mosque, the Moti Musjid, or Pearl Mosque; and well does it deserve its name, for it is as chaste and as rich as it can be. The domes only are seen above the red sandstone walls which enclose the mosque until the opening of two small fine brass gates, when the gem bathed in sunlight lies before you. But it is not full and untempered sunshine, for the Eastern architect designed with the sense of heat upon him and the value of shade. In the Moti Musjid, as in all other mosques, the central dome is always the largest, both in bulk and interest (as having the main archway), and the other two are subordained to it. Behind the front arches there is another row of three arches supported on marble pillars, and the interchange of light and gloom in the three parallel aisles rivets the gaze. To break the monotony of the rise of the bulbous domes, are placed at the corners small minarets, and to relieve the creamy whiteness of the marble the parapet has a rich tracing of tendrils. In grace, simplicity and perfect proportion the Moti Musjid cannot be surpassed, and it is a fine expression of what is best in the Moslem creed. It was built by a devout Islamite, Aurangzeb, the son of Shah Jehan, under whose sway the Moghul Empire attained its widest limits. The Royal Baths, with their luxuriant ornamentation, and the jewelled apartments for the lights of the Seraglio, however, bear witness that the dominion founded by the brave warriors from the Oxus had already begun to subside into emasculating debility. Rapid was the decline. Thirty years after Aurangzeb's decease (February 21, 1707) Nadir Shah, the Persian soldier of fortune, descended through the passes of Afghanistan and occupied and sacked Delhi. In the Diwan-i-Khas he exchanged with the vanquished Emperor his own serviceable head-dress for the jewelled turban of Muhammad Shah. Nadir Shah departed home, revealing to the free lances of the North that the power of the Great Moghul was not unassailable. The Afghans followed in his footsteps, and three years after his departure they captured Delhi and plundered the Imperial capital. Two years later the Mah- rattas dealt the mortal blow. After a month's siege they captured the city, desecrated the tombs and shrines, and stripped the Diwan-i-Khas of silver and gold ornaments. At the time (1788), when Burke in words of passionate eloquence was depicting the miseries caused by the wise administration of Hastings, a Rohilla chief made a sudden attack upon Dehli, seized the Emperor Shah Alum (who had bestowed the Diwani of Bengal on Clive), and in the

DELHI

Diwan-i-Khas he struck out the monarch's eyes with his dagger. The unfortunate Emperor was rescued by the Mahrattas, but only to become in turn their prisoner, until he was released by Lord Lake. The English general was ushered into the royal presence at the Diwan-i-Khas and found the Great Moghul "seated under a small tattered canopy, the remnant of his royal state, with every external appearance of the misery of his condition."

Within the wall of the Citadel palace the English allowed him to hold a mock court, and though the power of the Great Moghul had perished, the title continued to attract the veneration of the natives. It was this spell which caused the mutineers, the morning they entered Delhi, to march to the palace crying, "Help, O King! We pray for assistance in our fight for the faith"; and in the Imperial Hall of Special Audience, the native officers waited on the Emperor and "promised to establish his rule throughout the whole country." Before the sun had set a descendant of the immortal Timur once more reigned in the Imperial City.

On the evening of May 11, 1857, fifty Christian people, men, women, and children, were brought to the palace and confined in an underground apartment without a window and only one door, so that little of light and air entered the dreary dwelling. After being confined for five days in this gloomy, pestilential dungeon, starved and insulted, but defying their tormentors to the last, they were led into a courtyard and hewn to pieces. The whole dark truth of what took place can never be told. But swift came the hour of retribution. A few months passed away, when the British soldiers stormed the palace and bivouacked in the Diwan-i-Am, the great Hall of Audience, where travellers from all quarters of the globe in the days of old had admired the magnificence of the Moghul Caesars. On Sunday morning, September 20, the soldiers assembled in the Diwan-i-

Khas. It was no vain pomp or unmeaning ceremony, but the humble recognition of their merciful deliverance and final triumph. Through the Diwan-i-Khas rolled the words of our noble liturgy, and marble wall and gilded pillar echoed the cry that went forth from the depths of their brave hearts—"Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy name be the praise."

During my last visit to Delhi I enjoyed a delightful experience. Lord Roberts, who was at the time making a short stay in the Imperial capital, kindly undertook to describe to me on the theatre of their enactment the principal operations of the great siege which decided the destinies of India. One afternoon in March we made our expedition. Lord Roberts drove me first to the ramp which leads to the Cabul Gate, and here, alighting from the carriage, we walked up a narrow lane bounded on the right by the walls of the city, and on the left by houses with flat roofs, affording convenient shelter for sharpshooters. Sixty yards from the ramp the wall and lane suddenly bend, and on the city side there is a strong, lofty house, with a blank wall broken by only two windows. From one of these windows, in all probability, was fired the shot which proved fatal to John Nicholson. A tablet marks the spot where he fell. Of all the heroes who have made the Indian Mutiny our Iliad, none strikes the imagination like John Nicholson. Tall of person and of majestic presence, he well justified the title of "Lion of the Punjab." Strong and brave, he had the high moral grace which makes bravery and strength beautiful. He became to the wild races he governed a semi-divine figure, and they allowed him to drill them and lead them to Delhi. He reached the lane on the morning of the assault at the moment when the soldiers, seeing their leaders swept away by a torrent of grape and musketry, had begun to waver. Springing forward, Nicholson called with a stentorian voice upon the men to follow him, and instantly he was shot through the chest. Near the spot grows a tall and graceful tree; and, as his favourite personal orderly, Khaja Khan Raus. an Afghan who stormed with him the breach at Delhi, informs us: "The General then desired to be laid in the shade, and said, 'I will remain here till Delhi is taken.' He then called for some cold water. At that time I ordered a dooly from Delhi, and sent Latief Khan (with the General) to the General Hospital in camp, where Dr. —— gave him some medicine and he became a little better." Lord Roberts, in his Forty-one Years in India, states that at the Cashmere Gate he found a dooly deserted by its bearers. On opening the curtains, he discovered Nicholson, who said that he was in great agony, and asked him to have him removed to the hospital. Lord Roberts, with some difficulty, collected four men and had him carried into camp. The Afghan orderly tells us that "On September 20 the victory at Delhi was complete, the faces of the rebels were blackened, and they fled. I went to the Sahib and told him of the victory. He was greatly delighted, and said, 'My desire was that Delhi might be taken before I die, and it has been so.' " The news of the capture of the Moghul Palace and the complete acquisition of the city consoled the death-bed of John Nicholson. From the first there was little hope, and the pain he suffered was most excruciating. "Throughout those nine days of suffering," wrote Neville Chamberlain, "he bore himself nobly; not a lament or a sigh ever passed his lips, and he conversed as calmly and clearly as if he were talking of some other person's condition and not his own." His first care was for his country, and from his bed he aided the last military operations with his counsels. Day by day he grew weaker, but his intellect remained unclouded, and when life was fast ebbing away the stern warrior sent a message of tender humility to his oldest and dearest friend, Herbert Edwardes, and one to his mother, counselling her to be patient for his loss. "Tell my mother that I do not think we shall be unhappy in the next world." On the morning of September 23 the noble and fearless spirit of John Nicholson sped to the world "where God shall wipe away all tears." "He looked so peaceful," wrote the comrade who had watched by his bed. "The Sirdars of the Mooltanee Horse, and some other natives, were admitted to see him after death; and their honest praise could hardly find utterance for the tears they shed as they looked on their late master."

Leaving Rampart Road, we drove through the Cashmere gate, and stopped to read the inscription on the simple tablet which that fine soldier Lord Napier of Magdala had erected to the gallant men who sacrificed their lives in blowing up the gate the day the guilty city was stormed. The band of heroes had to advance in daylight to the gateway in the very teeth of a hot fire from all sides. The powder-bags were coolly laid and adjusted by the advance party, when Lieutenant Salkeld advanced to do his duty. While endeavouring to fire the charge he "was shot through the leg and arm, and handed over the slow match to Corporal Burgess, who fell mortally wounded just as he had successfully performed his duty." Thus in a few prosaic words the official despatch records one of the most heroic deeds which illustrate the annals of England. On the slab are inscribed the names of the four sepoys who also took part in that brave deed. Two were wounded and one was killed. It is meet and right to honour the memory of those who, in spite of terrible temptation, remain faithful to their colours. The history of the Mutiny abounds with examples of heroic deeds wrought by Englishmen; it also abounds with examples of noble self-sacrifice displayed by sepoys for their officers.

Leaving the Cashmere Gate, we drove through a road lined with fine trees, till we came to a low wall which separates Ludlow Castle from the road. It was here on the morning of the assault that Lord Roberts saw Nicholson at the head of his column. Leaving the carriage, we walked through the grounds till we came to two blocks of masonry marking the site of the famous No. 2 Battery, which made the breach for our troops to enter. Three days before the assault it was completed. Lord Roberts writes: "I was posted to the left half of No. 2 Battery, and had charge of the two right guns. At eight o'clock on the morning of September 11 we opened fire on the Cashmere bastion and the adjoining curtain; and as the shots told and the stones flew into the air and rolled down, a loud cheer burst from the Artillerymen and some of the men of the Carabiniers and 9th Lancers, who had volunteered to work in the batteries. The enemy had got our range with wonderful accuracy, and immediately on the screen in front of the right gun being removed, a round shot came through the embrasure, knocking two or three of us over. On regaining my feet, I found that the young Horse Artilleryman who was serving the vent while I was laying the gun had had his right arm taken off. . . .

On the evening of September 13 Nicholson came to see whether we gunners had done our work thoroughly enough to warrant the assault being made the next morning. He was evidently satisfied, for when he entered our battery he said: ‘I must shake hands with you fellows: you have done your best to make my work easy to-morrow.’

After leaving Ludlow Castle we proceeded along the road till we reached the top of the ridge where was enacted one of the great events of our nation’s history. This rocky ridge, sixty feet above the city, was not only a coign of vantage for attack, but a rampart for defence. Below the centre, and extending to the left, the British camp was pitched in and around the old cantonment. Deserting the carriage, we walked to the military cemetery, where the majority of those who fell during the siege were buried. Of all desolate sights this is the most desolate. A few stunted trees stand within the enclosure, and every yard of ground is a raised mound covered with dried yellow grass. Interspersed among the mounds are a few substantial tombs. But this barren spot is full of soul-stirring associations, for here lies the dust of heroes. After some search we found the tomb of Lieutenant Quintin Battye, Commandant of the Guide Cavalry, who fell mortally wounded by a bullet from the ramparts. “Now I have a chance of seeing service,” was his joyous exclamation, as he set forth with his corps from the frontier to Delhi. A keen soldier, good swordsman, and fine rider, there was every prospect of a splendid career for the intrepid lad. But he fell at his first fight, and as life ebbed away he murmured with his failing voice the old Roman saying engraved on his tomb, that it is well and proper for a man to die for his country. But for the heroes lying beneath the yellow mounds there is not the empty fame, “In the glistening foil set off to the world.” Their names are not inscribed on tablets, but “the working of the good and the brave, seen or unseen, endures literally for ever, and cannot die.”

Leaving the cemetery, we retraced our steps till we reached the Flagstaff Tower, which was one of our four great posts on the ridge during the siege, and was held by a strong infantry picquet. Farther on to the south of the Tower is an old Pathan mosque, whose stout walls also afforded shelter to a picquet. Not far from it was the Observatory erected by the great Rajpoot astronomer, a strong old building, near which our heavy gun battery was erected. Three hundred yards from the Observatory, we came to Hindu Rao’s house, built by a Mahratta nobleman, who was in the old days famous for his hospitality. Our troops found it deserted, and occupied it. The enemy knew it was the key of our position, and all through the siege made the most desperate attempts to capture it. But the post of honour and danger was confided to Major Reed and his gallant Gurkhas, and all attempts to dislodge them were made in vain. At first Major Reed had only his own battalion and two companies of the 60th Rifles, but after a time the Guides Infantry was added, and on an alarm he was reinforced by two more companies of the 60th Rifles. The house in which he resided with his corps was within perfect range of nearly all the enemy’s heavy guns, and was riddled through and through with shot and shell. He never quitted the ridge save to attack the enemy below it, and never once visited the camp until carried to it wounded the day of the assault.

On the extreme right of the ridge, where the lofty Memorial of the great siege now stands, the besiegers had a heavy gun battery, known as the Right Battery, which was twelve hundred yards from the city wall. From the steps of the Memorial we saw a sight of great beauty. Below us lay a stretch of broken ground dotted with green trees. Beyond it was a long line of purple walls, within which rose the fair city with its stately mosques and minarets. As we gazed, the white dome of the Jumma Musjid caught a pale pink flush, and of a sudden the full glory of the setting sun fell upon the tall red minarets, and a golden glow swept over the blue waters of the Jumna. All was peaceful now. It was hard to picture the mortal strife for Empire which took place in that valley only a quarter of a century ago.

Quitting with regret our point of vantage, we descended the ridge, and drove back towards the city. As we approached the Cashmere Gate, Lord Roberts expressed his intention of paying a last visit to the grave of John Nicholson, for his "forty-one years' service in India" had been completed, and he was on his way home. Thirty-six years before, the Commander-in-Chief, then a subaltern in the Bengal Artillery, had marched out of Delhi the morning of Nicholson's funeral. "It was a matter of regret to me," he writes in his modest autobiography, "that I was unable to pay a last tribute of respect to my loved and honoured friend and commander by following his body to the grave, but I could not leave the column." The old cemetery stands by the road, and is surrounded by lofty trees. The inside is bright with budding flowers and roses. Near the entrance is the grave of John Nicholson. A few roses were placed on the tomb by his old comrade, and he stood for many minutes gazing at the resting-place of his loved and honoured friend. He then joined us at the gate, and as we drove away, beyond the cemetery walls we had, through the trees, a glimpse of the breach through which Nicholson led his victorious soldiers. "I never saw any one like him," was the only remark that broke the silence.

DELHI

We return through the Cashmere Gate to the city. Passing by the church, we reach an archway supported by two towers. This is the old gate which led to the Delhi Arsenal. The past in one flash of consciousness rushes back. Thirty years ago my father used often to drive me through that gate, and great was my boyish delight at the sight of all the guns and munitions of war. On a tablet above the archway are inscribed the names of the nine valiant, resolute men who, deserted by all their dependants, for some hours kept at bay a multitude of trained and disciplined men. Then the guns could no longer be worked. A shout of triumph rose from the walls. It was momentary. The signal was given and the train lighted. A crash of thunder followed, and the exulting assailants were dashed to pieces by the explosion of hundreds of shells and powder barrels. And the three hundred Spartans who in the summer morning sat "combing their long hair" in the passes of Thermopylae have not earned a more lofty estimate for themselves than these nine modern Englishmen. A name on the tablet recalls a dear memory and a great sorrow. But the heart swells with pride at the thought that his name will live long as men reverence deeds of valour.

"My Son,
No sound is breathed, so potent to coerce
And to conciliate, as their names who dare,
For that sweet motherland which gave them birth,
Nobly to do, nobly to die. Their names,
Engraven on memorial columns, are song
Heard in the future; few, but more than wall
And rampart, their examples reach a hand
Far thro' all years, and everywhere they meet
And kindle generous purpose and the strength
To mould it into action pure as theirs."
AGRA

AGRA, like Delhi, has been indebted, if not for its origin, at any rate for its importance, to the commercial and strategical advantages of its position. The Jumna was the natural highway for the traffic of the rich delta of Bengal to the heart of India, and it formed from very ancient times the frontier defence of the Aryan stock settled in the rich plain between the Ganges and the Jumna against their western neighbours, hereditary freebooters who occupied the highlands of Central India. Along this great highway the early settlers built forts, planted trees, and cultivated their fields. The groves which lined the banks of the curling stream were the homes of the deities of their mythology. Foremost among these was Krishna, the Hindu Apollo, the royal god of light. About thirty miles south of Delhi, on the western bank of the Jumna, stands Bindraban, which means the Tulasi grove, or the grove of Holy Basil. As Daphne was turned into the laurel, hence sacred to Apollo, so Krishna's coy nymph was converted into a lovely shrub of Tulasi, alike sacred to him. At Bindraban Krishna passed much of his youth. In olden days an ancient tree was shown at whose root Krishna sat and played so divinely his celestial reed (bansuli) that all the wild beasts and reptiles of the forest assembled round him to listen. Here is the spot where, like Apollo, he slew a terrible python (Kali Naga), which by lying across the Jumna stopped its course and poisoned its waters. Here he stole the raiments of the maidens as they laved "their sweet limbs" in the stream. In the meads beside the waters he loved to sport with the cow-herds and milk-maids, and as he touched his reed one said, "Oh, favoured stream of Jumna, where Krishna deigned to drink." Another cried, "Melodious above all is the flute which resides for ever in his lips"; and another exclaimed, "Honoured above all existing animals are these cattle which the Creator Himsel leads to pasture." Under the name of Gopala, Krishna is the pastoral Apollo who fed the herds of Armeties. Pan is not dead. The Hindu women as they call the cows and buffaloes home, hear his pipe, and the beautiful, brave, and amorous Krishna is the most beloved of all deities. Nine miles below Bindraban stands the sacred city of Mathura, the birthplace of Krishna. At the time when history begins to dawn on us it was the capital of an extensive kingdom of the same name. Four miles south-east from Mathura (Muttra), perched on some beetling cliffs, is Gokul (cow-stall), the suburb of ancient Mahaban, where Krishna was cradled. Mahaban means the Great Forest, and in the ravines and woods around the Moghul Emperors had their royal hunts and killed their tigers. Thirty-six miles below Muttra in a bend of the river lies Agra. No place was better fitted for an emporium and for a frontier fortress. It combined the advantages of the river, being at no time fordable, and yet being capable of navigation to boats of heavy tonnage throughout the year. Whether the genius of some far-seeing warrior or the natural development of traffic called Agra into being it is vain to surmise. It is equally vain to attempt to settle its high antiquity by the derivation of its name from the Sanskrit word agr, in front. Another suggested derivation is that Agra is the shortened form of Agrahara, a royal doffation of land or village to Brahmins. We have the substantial evidence of ancient coins as to its Hindu origin, and

Jehangir in his autobiography tells us that before his father, Akbar, built the present fort, the town was defended by a citadel of great antiquity. For three hundred years the Afghans and other tribes came down from the north and founded kingdoms; and their power radiated from Delhi and Agra. It was Sikandar, of the house of Lodi, the last of the Afghan dynasties, who realized the strategic importance of Agra as a point for keeping in check his rebellious vassals to the south. He removed his court there, and Agra, from being “a mere village of old standing,” says a Persian chronicler, became the capital of a kingdom. On Sunday, December 14, 1517, the year that Luther made his great “protest,” Sikandar Lodi, one of the fiercest persecutors of the Hindus, died at Agra, after a reign of twenty-eight years. The suburb of Sikandar, now best known as the site of Akbar’s tomb, was named after him. It was here, five years before his death, he built the fine red-stone summer-house where Akbar afterwards buried his wife, who is supposed to have been a Portuguese. Sikandar was succeeded by his son Ibrahim, who fell on the fateful field of Panipat, “having five or six thousand of the slain lying in heaps in a small space around him.” On the very day of the battle Baber 1 pushed forward two detachments, the one to Delhi, the other to Agra, both to prevent the plunder and to secure the treasures of these cities. Next morning, says Baber, “we marched,” and on the third day we encamped to the south of Delhi, between the Kutub Minar and the Jumna. On Friday, April 27, 1526, his name as Emperor was read in the public prayers at the Grand Mosque, and the following morning he proceeded “march upon march upon Agra.” On reaching the suburb of that city he found the fort had not surrendered, though Humayun, his son, had blockaded it. In the citadel were the wives and children and some of the chief followers of Bakrama Jit, the Hindu Raja of Gwalior, who, Baber states, "has governed that country for upwards of a hundred years." The Raja had been compelled to surrender his principality to Ibrahim, and was enrolled in his service. According to the charitable mode in which a good Muhammadan signifies the death of an infidel, Baber writes, "In the battle in which Ibrahim was defeated, Bikermajit was sent to hell." His wives and followers, in attempting to escape from the fort at Agra, were captured. Humayun behaved generously to the captives, and prevented their being plundered. "Of their own free will they presented to Humayun a Pish-kash (a present to a superior), consisting of a quantity of jewels and precious stones. Among these was one famous diamond which had been acquired by Sultan Alaeddin. It is so valuable that a judge of diamonds valued it at half the daily expenses of the whole world." This diamond was the Kohinoor, which Tavernier the jeweller, a competent judge, afterwards valued at £880,000 sterling. On Baber's arrival Humayun presented it to his father, who returned it to him.

On Thursday, May 10, the Emperor entered Agra, and took up his residence at Sultan Ibrahim's palace. It was the hottest season of the year, and Baber's followers began to long for their cool mountain homes. "Many men dropped down and died on the spot." The inhabitants in terror fled before them, "so that we could not find grain nor provender either for ourselves or for our horses. The villagers, out of hostility and hatred to us, had taken to rebellion, thieving and robbery. The roads became impassable." All these evils made his best men lose heart. They objected to remaining in Hindustan, and even began to make preparations for their return, but Baber was determined to found a Tatar empire in India. As soon as he heard of the murmurings among his troops he summoned a council of his nobles.

"I told them that empire and conquest could not be acquired without the materials and means of war: That royalty and nobility could not exist without subjects and dependent provinces: That, by the labour of many years after undergoing great hardships, measuring many a toilsome journey, and raising various armies; after exposing myself and my troops to circumstances of great danger, to battle and bloodshed, by the Divine favour I had routed my formidable enemy, and achieved the conquest of the numerous provinces and kingdoms which we at present held: 'And now what force compels, and that hardship obliges us, without any visible cause, after having worn out our life in accomplishing the desired achievement, to abandon and fly from our conquests, and to retreat back to Kabul with every symptom of disappointment and discomfiture? Let not any one who calls himself my friend ever henceforward make such a proposal. But if there is any among you who cannot bring himself to stay or to give up his purpose of returning back, let him depart.'"

Baber was speedily rewarded for his heroic firmness. "It was no sooner known," says Erskine, "that his invasion was not to be a temporary inroad, like those of Mahmúd of Ghaznae and the Great Taimur, but that he was to remain permanently in the country and govern it on the spot, than new fears and new hopes began to operate both on the natives and the Afghans. His generous policy, his manly deportment and known valour inspired his friends with confidence, and struck terror into his enemies." The consequence was soon visible. The Afghan chieftains were reduced to obedience. The decisive battle of Khanwa, near Biana¹ (March, 1527), and the storming of the great Hindu stronghold Chánderi on the south-east of Malwa, destroyed

all hope of there ever being again a Rajpoot Empire. Three years after Panipat, Baber had brought Behar and Bengal under his sway. This is the last campaign of which we have the history from his own pen, and of the military events of the next fifteen months we hardly know anything. The silence of his diary was no doubt due to the decline in his health, which had become evident to all around him. The grave illness of his son Humayun, whose cultivated mind and sprightly wit rendered him especially dear to his father, was a mortal blow. The native historians inform us how Humayun was brought to Agra stricken unto death, and Baber, seated one day in his palace overlooking the Jumna, exclaimed that of all things his life was what was dearest to Humayun, as Humayun was to him; that his life, therefore, he cheerfully devoted as a sacrifice for his son's, and prayed the Most High to vouchsafe to accept it. "The noblemen around him entreated him to retract the rash vow, and, in place of his first offering, to give the diamond taken at Agra, and reckoned the most valuable on earth; that the ancient sages had said that it was the dearest of our possessions alone that was to be offered to Heaven. But he persisted in his resolution, declaring that no stone, of whatever value, could be put in competition with his life. He three times walked round the dying prince, a solemnity similar to that used in sacrifices and heave-offerings, and, retiring, prayed earnestly to God. After some time he was heard to exclaim, 'I have borne it away.'"

The Muhammadan historians declare that the son daily grew better while the father daily grew worse. Baber soon after died in his palace near Agra on December 26, 1530. He was only forty-eight, yet one of the most illustrious sovereigns that ever filled a throne. Erskine's portrait of him is worthy to rank with any in Clarendon's stately record:

"His character was happily compounded of most of the qualities that go to form a great prince and a good man. He was bold, enterprising, full of ardour, and possessed of the commanding talents that sway and lead the mind of man. His temper was frank, confiding and gay, and maintained through life the freshness of youth. He had strong affections, the warmest of domestic feelings, was devotedly attached to his relations and friends, and ready to sympathize with the pleasures and the sufferings of human beings of every class. Keenly alive to whatever was grand and beautiful, he cultivated knowledge of every kind with unwearied assiduity and with proportional success. Glory in every shape inflamed his imagination, and he attained a rare eminence of power and renown. Yet no man's success could be more entirely his own."

Three days after the Emperor's death, Humayun ascended the throne, and during the brief intervals when there was not so much a state of tranquillity as a suspension of arms between the hostile monarchs, Agra was more often the royal city than Delhi. It was the post from which the Emperor took the field in his various campaigns against the Afghans, who still possessed vast estates and considerable power throughout India and were ready on the first signal to fly to arms. The Empire which the great Baber established required to be sustained by the firm and dexterous hand of the founder. Humayun had his father's quick intellect and his personal courage, but his mind was naturally indolent, and he never commanded the esteem of his subjects. After nine years of discord and confusion his army was dispersed and his camp taken at Kanaug by Shir Khan, an Afghan of great ability, caution, and enterprise.1 Humayun fled from Agra to Lahore, and for five years Shir Shah, who had previously ruled Bengal and Bahar, reigned over Hindustan. He made Agra his headquarters, and is said to have built a palace within the walls of the old fort. On May 24, 1645, while conducting the siege of the fort of Kalinjer, the key of Bandelkand, he was dreadfully burnt by the explosion of a tumbrel. "In spite of the excruciating pain which he suffered, he had fortitude enough to walk to the trenches, and directed that the accident should be concealed from his troops. Here he remained, and as from time to time new storming parties advanced to the assault, he cheered them on with his voice, issued occasional orders with astonishing composure, and sent away such of his officers as came about him, to join the action. The attack was continued with unremitting vigour. As the cry to evening prayers was heard, news were brought to the King that the fort had fallen. 'Thanks be to Almighty God,' he said, and quietly expired." The Sur dynasty, which rose by the genius of Shir Khan, and was sustained by the talents of his son Salim, fell by the ignorance and vice of their successors. In 1555 Humayun returned to India, obtained a complete victory over Sikandra Shah and the Afghans at Sirhind, and once more ascended the musnud at Delhi. Agra surrendered without any resistance. After having arranged affairs in the Imperial city, he was about to proceed there, when, as he was descending some steps, his foot slipped and he fell headlong to the bottom. He was carried into his palace, where, after lingering for four days, he expired, on January 24, 1556. Humayun was succeeded by his son, Jalal-ud-din (the glory of the faith) Muhammad, called Akbar the Great, and few monarchs have so well deserved the title by which he is known in history. At his accession to the crown he was a little over thirteen, but he had been already trained in the rough school of war, and he possessed those qualities which Englishmen admire—good temper, vast muscular strength, and unflinching courage. Among mountaineers remarkable for their feats of strength and bodily activity few outdid him in their national pastimes. He was fond of sport, and took a special delight in hunting the royal tiger and capturing herds of wild elephants. Three years after his accession

Akbar took up his residence in Agra and, pleased with its situation on the banks of the Jumna, "the waters of which has few rivals for lightness and taste," and, incited by its strategic position, he determined to make it the seat of his empire. The brick walls of the old citadel were fast crumbling away, and Akbar ordered his Lord High Admiral (Kasim Khan) to build on the same site a new fort at Futtahpore. A multitude of labours urged the conclusion of the work, but eight years passed before the stupendous fortress was completed. The strong and lofty walls of red sandstone, which glisten like jasper in the rays of an Indian sun, are a mile and a half in circuit, and all that could adorn the dignity of an Imperial residence, or contribute to the comfort or pleasure of its numerous inhabitants, were contained within them. The shape has been likened to a crescent and a triangle, with its base stretching for half a mile along the river bank on the east. The other two sides are almost of equal lengths, and at the angles are massive projecting bastions. On the north, towards the city, is the Delhi Gate, a massive pile flanked by two enormous octagonal towers of red sandstone, inlaid with white marble, and crowned by two domes.

After crossing a drawbridge which leads across the deep moat that surrounds the crenelated ramparts of the fort, and passing up a paved ascent, we drive across a barren square till we reach a broad flight of steps leading to a red sandstone platform. Mounting them, we come to a fine gateway. A door is thrown open, and we find ourselves in a quadrangle paved with white marble, and on either side is a marble colonnade with exquisite arches, supported on light pillars of perfect grace. Opposite is a marble mosque resting on finely proportioned Saracenic arches supported on a row of triple pillars, massive, and exquisitely carved at the base. The whole is crowned with three white marble domes, and elegant kiosks break the monotony, which a long straight line would present to the eye. No more pure and stainless sanctuary was ever created by man in honour of the Creator. On the entablature there is an inscription of black letters inlaid in the white marble, which informs us that the mosque "may be likened to a mansion of paradise or to a precious pearl"; and that the building was completed in seven years, at the cost of three lakhs of rupees, in the twenty-sixth year of the fortunate reign of Shah Jehan, in the year of the Hegira one thousand and sixty-three (A.D. 1665), the year when the gay Charles was on the throne of England and plague had devastated London.

A short distance from the Moti Musjid, or Pearl Mosque, lies the palace erected by Shah Jehan, under whom the Moghul Empire attained its highest limit of strength and magnificence. A somewhat mean portal leads to a square planted with trees and flowers and a few vines, which give to the courtyard the name of Anguri Bagh, or Grape Garden. White marble walks radiate from a marble platform in the centre, and the beds are after the manner of the

Moghul gardens, divided into numerous small compartments by ridges of red sandstone. Legend states that the soil was brought from Cashmere, and to this day its depth and richness are extolled by the gardeners. Around the courts are the apartments which the lights of the harem used to occupy, and opposite, on a raised platform of white marble, stands a dark hall—the Khas Mahal, or reception room of the royal ladies. In front of the hall is a colonnade opening into the court. “The flat roof is supported on enfraged arches, springing from massive square pillars, whose base and capital are ornamented with sprays of flowers. Three smaller arches give access from the colonnade to the hall, and on the opposite side are three archways with windows overlooking the river.” Here the fair captives enjoyed the fresh breezes of the morning, and gazed upon the blue waters of the Jumna and the palaces and gardens of the nobles which lined its banks. Here they could watch the Emperor review his troops, and, unseen, catch a glimpse of the gay cavalcade that surrounded him. It was the only glimpse which the captives had of the outer world. No male was admitted into the palace, except the Emperor, and the domestic work was entirely done by women. It was a paradise of luxury and splendour. All gold and silver stuffs and jewels and all things gorgeous and costly were provided for the inmates, but it was a prison. The description of the harem of the Emperor Akbar by his minister reveals how dreary the daily life must have been. He informs us the harem contained a separate room for every one of the women, whose number exceeded five thousand, who were divided into companies, with proper employment assigned to each individual. Over each of these companies a woman was appointed (darogha), and one was selected for the command of the whole, in order that the affairs of the harem, the writer adds, “might be conducted with the same regularity and good government as the other departments of the State.” “Every one received a salary according to her merit. The pen cannot measure the extent of the Emperor's largesses, but the ladies of the first quality received from one thousand to sixteen hundred rupees, and the servants according to their rank—from two rupees to fifty-one per month. And whenever any of this multitude of women wanted anything, they applied to the treasurer of the harem, who, according to their monthly stipend, took care their wants should be supplied. The inside of the harem was guarded by women, and the most confidential were placed about the royal apartments. The eunuch watched immediately on the outside gate, and at proper distances were placed the Rajpoots and porters; and on the outside of the enclosure the Omrahs, the Ahdeecans, and other troops mounted guard according to their rank. But besides all the precautions above described, his Majesty depends on his own vigilance as well as on that of his guards." It would be impossible to imagine a less romantic and more monotonous existence. But in spite of all the Emperor's vigilance "the human need of loving," as Browning says, had to be gratified even in the harem, and was too strong for his precautions. Below the palace are some dreary vaults. In the most gloomy of them we see a pit, and over it a beam highly carved, and from the beam dangles a silken cord. Here the frail ones of the harem were hanged.

Returning to the light of day, we ascended the platform of the Khas Mahal, and walking to the right we came to a marble open lattice-work screen, beautiful from its extreme simplicity. The screen separates the reception-room from a pavilion hanging over the river, and the most sacred of sacred apartments—those which were occupied by the Emperor and the favourite inmates of the harem. Two square chambers united by an arch, with three graceful Saracenic arches opening into the marble court, form the pavilion. The walls are encrusted with Jasper, carnelian, lapis-lazuli, agate and bloodstone, and the balconies and terraces are marble wrought into lace. Hard by "the jewelled and enamelled caskets" of Shah Jehan is the red sandstone palace, which bears the name of Jehangir Mahal. "Nowhere," states Ferguson, "is the contrast between the two styles more strongly marked than in the palace of Agra: from the red stone palace of Akbar, with its rich sculpture and square Hindu construction, a door opens into the white marble court of the harem of Shah Jehan, with all its feeble prettiness, but at the same time marked with that peculiar elegance which is found only in the East." The exact date of the building of the palace cannot be ascertained, but there is good reason to suppose that it was built before the time of Akbar or of Jehangir. To erect it only Hindu architects and artists must have been employed, and it is a noble example of the Hindu skill in building and the luxuriance of his imagination. But it is imagination disciplined by the study of art. In the whole building there is nothing mean and commonplace, and there is not a single inch of ornament lacking in originality. The Hindu mason has impressed his originality on Saracenic geometrical tracery. The palace addresses the eye by a few clear and forceful lines, and it appeals to the imagination by the richness of the work. It is entered from Shah Jehan's harem, through a noble archway forming the centre of three sides of a quadrangle. Never were pillars erected more slender and graceful than those which support this porch. The round capitals are richly and elaborately sculptured, and send out elegant brackets on each side from above their tops. It is impossible to imagine anything in better taste than the way niches and recesses in the walls are faced with white marble, beautifully carved into engraved work, the points of which terminate with graceful oval pendants. Making our way through corridors and halls, each more elegant than the other, we reached the grand open pillared hall on the north side. From the first row of pillars project brackets of exquisite workmanship, which support broad sloping coves formed of thin slabs of stones. The roof, supported by stone cross-beams, with great dragons carved on them, is "a wonder of architectural constructive ingenuity." ¹

Passing from the grand court through corridors, we again came to the Anguri Bagh, and crossing the square we entered the Shisha Mahal, or the baths built for the inmates of the palace. "The Shisha Mahal, or house of glass, is both curious and elegant, although the material is principally pounded tanc and looking-glass. It consists of two rooms, of which the walls in the interior are divided into a thousand different panels, each of which is filled up with raised flowers in silver, gold, and colours, on a ground-work of tiny convex mirrors! The idea it impresses on the mind is that of being inside some curiously worked and arched box—so unlike is the apartment to a room! The roof reminds you of the style of ceiling that prevailed during the time of Louis the XIV., and resembles the ceilings at Versailles. Pounded mica has the effect of silver. Fronting the entrance, in the second room, are three rows of niches for lights, and below, standing forward a little, there are more rows of marble niches for the same. From the top, the water pours out, and falls in a broad sheet over the upper lights, and is received below in a basin, from which it again pours forth in another fall over the lower row of lights, so that you see the lights burning behind the falling waters. The waters are then received in a fountain, which springs high and sparkles in the glare, and then, running over a marble causeway, fills another beautifully carved white marble basin, from the centre of which springs another fountain, which is in the first apartment.” As we wandered through the baths we recalled to mind Lady Montagu’s graphic description of the scene she witnessed in the Baths at Constantinople. She tells us that, as lightly clad as Eve before the fall: “They walked and moved with the same majestic grace which Milton describes of our general mother. There were many amongst them as exactly proportioned as ever any goddess was drawn by the pencil of Guido or Titian, and most of their skins shinningly white, only adorned by their beautiful hair, divided into many tresses, hanging on their shoulders, braided either with pearl or ribbon, perfectly representing the figures of the Graces.”

From the Shisa Mahal we proceeded to the Saman Burj, or Jasmine Tower, the boudoir of the chief Sultana. It is a fairy pavilion, exquisitely carved in marble, and ornamented with flowers wrought in precious stones. The court below the pavilion is arranged in squares of coloured marbles, so that the inmates of the harem could enjoy the game of pachisi—somewhat similar to our draughts. A staircase leads from the Jasmine Tower to the Diwan-i-Khas, or hall of private audience. This finely proportioned hall opens by three arches on a lofty colonnade with a flat roof, supported by noble Saracen arches springing from graceful slender pillars arranged in pairs. The bases of the pillars are ornamented with the purest of white marble flowers, traced so delicately on the stone that they seem rather drawn than sculptured; and these are surrounded by a band of mosaic flowers of the brightest colours. Near the Diwan-i-Khas, on a terrace facing the river, is the great marble slab commonly called the Black Marble Throne of Jehangir. The stone has split through in a slanting direction in the middle, and the presence of iron in its composition has given it a reddish stain in one spot. Hence the legend that the throne emitted blood when desecrated by the foot of the infidel. Hawkins, who visited Agra during the reign of Jehangir, informs us that the black slab was used by the Emperor to pray upon. He writes:

"In the morning at break of day, the King is at his beads, praying, on his knees, upon a Persian lamb-skin, having some eight rosaries, or strings of beads, each containing 400. The beads are of rich pearl, ballace rubies, diamonds, rubies, emeralds, aloes, wood, esham and coral. At the upper end of a large black stone on which he kneels there are figures graven in stone of the Virgin and Christ; so turning his face to the west he repeats 3,200 words, according to the number of his beads."

On the other side of the court is a white marble slab on which the Vizier sat. It overlooks the Machi Bhawan (or Fish Tank), a vast courtyard of red sandstone, which has a tank in its centre and a series of chambers on two sides. On the east there is a platform where the grandees of the Court waited till they were admitted to a private audience with the Emperor. At a corner of the square is the Naginah Musjid, or Gem Mosque, which well bears out its name. This exquisite shrine of white marble stands in the centre of a small court, walled in with white slabs, and consists of three tiny aisles, supported on square plain pillars, from which spring Saracenic arches supporting the roof, which is crowned with three domes. This was the private mosque for the ladies of the harem. They had access to it by means of a screened passage, which led by the Diwan-i-Am to their apartments. Following this passage we came to the royal gallery, which overlooked the Diwan-i-Am, or hall of public audience. "It is a pavilion of white marble, inlaid with jasper and cornelian, in the form of flowers, ornamented scrolls, and sentences of the Koran. Below it is an immense slab of white marble, on which he (the Emperor) was accustomed to seat himself.” Seated on the marble slab and looking down on the deserted hall and barren courtyard, the memory goes back to the scene which the Emperor witnessed when Agra had reached the meridian of its glory. Captain Hawkins, who was in high favour with Jehangir, writes:

“... At three o’clock all the nobles then in Agra, who are in health, resort to court, when the King comes forth to open audience, sitting in his royal seat, and all the nobles standing before him, each according to his degree. The chiefs of the nobles standing within the red rail, and all the rest without, all being properly placed by the Lieutenant-General. The space within the red rail is three steps higher than where the rest stand, and within this red rail I was placed among the chiefest of the land. All the rest are placed in their order by officers, and they likewise are placed within another rail in a spacious place, and without the rail stand all kinds of horsemen and foot-soldiers belonging to his captains, and all other comers. At these rails there are many doors kept by a great number of porters, who have white rods to keep every one in order. In the middle of the place, right before the King, stands one of the King’s sheriffs or judges, together with the chief executioner, who is attended by forty executioners, distinguished from all others by a peculiar kind of quilted caps on their heads, some with hatchets on their shoulders, and others with all sorts of whips, ready to execute the King’s commands. The King hears all manner of causes in this place, staying about two hours every day for that purpose: or the Kings in India sit in judgment every day, and their sentences are put in execution every Tuesday.”

It is interesting to know what manner of man was the Sovereign who was surrounded with so much splendour. Hawkins writes:

“... After this he retires to his private chamber for prayers, when four or five kinds of finely dressed roast meats are set before him, of which he eats till his stomach is satisfied, drinking after his meal one cup of strong drink. He then goes into a private room into which no one enters, but such as are named by himself, where for two years I was one of his attendants; and here he drinks other five cups of strong liquor, being the quantity allowed by his physicians. This done, he chews opium, and being intoxicated, he goes to sleep, and every one departs to his home. He is awakened after two hours to get his supper, at which time he is unable to feed himself, but has it thrust into his mouth by others, which is about one o’clock in the morning, after which he sleeps the rest of the night.”

The glory of the Moghul Empire was the transient glory of barbarous splendour and outward show. Neither property nor life was safe from tyrannical caprice. Hawkins, writing about Jehangir, states:

“While I was at his court, I have seen him do many cruel deeds. Five times a week he orders some of his bravest elephants to fight in his presence, during which men are often killed or grievously wounded by the elephants. If any one be sore hurt, though he might very well chance to recover, he causes him to be thrown into the river, saying, ‘Despatch him, for as long as he lives he will continually curse me, wherefore it is better that he die presently.’ He delights to see men executed and torn in pieces by elephants.”

Not an English traveller, but a Muhammadan historian, relates the following anecdote concerning Akbar, the wisest and most tolerant of all the Moghul Emperors:

“At that time the Emperor used to retire for a long interval, after evening prayers, during which time the servants and courtiers used to disperse, assembling again when they expect his Majesty to reappear. That evening he happened to come out sooner than usual, to hear the news from the Dakhin, and at first found none of the servants in the palace. When he came near the throne and couch, he saw a luckless lamp lighter, coiled up like a snake, in a careless death-like sleep, close to the royal couch. Enraged at the sight, he ordered him to be thrown from the tower, and he was dashed into a thousand pieces.”

The Moghul Emperors have left behind them some of the most beautiful buildings in the world as monuments of their rule, and the English have erected some of the ugliest, but the administration of the Moghuls will not bear comparison with our more prosaic and less splendid rule. We have given the natives peace, order, and security, for anarchy and oppression. But it behoves England to ponder well upon the task which her brave soldiers and illustrious statesmen have set her in India. To preserve her Empire

she must do more than dig canals and build railways, material monuments of dominion. The besetting sin of a bureaucracy of foreigners is a blind belief in administrative machinery. During our century of rule we have made but little impression on the people. All we have done is to civilize administratively, and in doing so not only old mis-managements but "reforms and taxations new" have produced their inevitable harvest of misery and disaffection.
This cannot be met merely by legislation, but by the instruction and enlightenment of the people. Contact with the West has created changes in social relations and religious feelings, and the mental and moral agitation, the hopes and aspirations of the educated classes, must not be ignored, but guided by a wide, thorough, and liberal education. It is very insecure to reign supreme on the frail foundation of being the welcome composer of political troubles and the constructor of great public works. The sewage system of Rome was a wonder and model to the world, but the Roman Empire perished.

Six miles from Agra on the Delhi road is situated the tomb of the Great Akbar. We drive to it in the early morning, when the air is cool and crisp, through a green aisle of noble trees, from whose boughs chatter a host of green parrots.
The effigy of a horse in red sandstone attracts our notice,
and walled gardens, time-stricken mosques and tombs remind us of the days when the Moghuls ruled the land, and Agra was one of the most splendid cities in the East. The carriage stops at a massive square pavilion, whose terrace

is crowned by eight kiosks and four shattered white marble minarets. The façade is pierced by a lofty pointed arch, and ornamented by bold incrustations in coloured marble and by broad black inscriptions in the flowing graceful Persian character. The inscriptions set forth the praises of the monarch and the mausoleum. The name of the Emperor Jehangir, the son of Akbar, is given as that of the founder, and it is stated that the work was completed in the seventh year of his reign, corresponding to 1613 A.D. Jehangir in his autobiography informs us that in this year of his reign he went "on foot to see the resplendent sepulchre of his father."

"When I had obtained the good fortune of visiting the tomb, and had examined the building which was erected over it, I did not find it to my liking. My intention was, that it should be so exquisite that the travellers of the world could not say they had seen one like it in any part of the inhabited earth. While the work was in progress, in consequence of the rebellious conduct of the unfortunate Khusru, I was obliged to march towards Lahore. The builders had built it according to their own taste, and had altered the original design at their discretion. The whole money had been thus expended, and the work had occupied three or four years. I ordered that clever architects, acting in concert with some intelligent persons, should pull down the objectionable parts which I pointed out. By degrees a very large and magnificent building was raised, with a nice garden round it, entered by a lofty gate, consisting of minarets made of white stone."

Finch, who visited Agra about this time, writes:

"Nothing more finished yet after ten years' work. This tomb," he adds, "is much worshipped both by Moors and Gentiles, holding him for a great saint."

Hawkins states:

"It hath been fourteen years building, and it is thought will not be finished these fourteen years more. The least that works there daily are three thousand people; but this much I will say, that one of our workmen will despatch more than three of them."

Passing through the gateway we come to a square planted with grand old trees, and carpeted with grass as green as an English lawn. It looks more like an English park than an Indian garden. At the end of a broad stone causeway rises the mausoleum on a raised red-sandstone platform. The lower story is pierced with ten large Moorish arches, and in the centre is a larger Moorish archway adorned with marble mosaic. Above this rise three storeys of diminishing size, all being of red sandstone, and marked by rows of kiosks of exquisite lightness and elegance of design. Above the last story is a white marble square, paved with white and coloured marble, around which runs a corridor of marble supported on the most delicate pillars; and the whole is surrounded by an outer screen of marble divided into panels of marble trellis-work of the most beautiful pattern. The terrace has no roof. Finch says:

"It was to be inarched over with the most curious white and speckled marble, to be ceiled all within with pure sheet gold richly inwrought."

Fergusson considers if the tomb had been crowned with a domical chamber it certainly would have ranked next the Taj among Indian mausoleums. To have crowned it with a dome might have destroyed the characteristic features of the building, and any canopy but that of the vault of heaven would certainly have diminished its romance. To look at the bright blue sky roofing the white marble tomb and to watch the sunlight on the beautiful flowers carved on it reveals the poetry and genius of the designer. In Persian characters are inscribed the ninety-nine names or attributes of the deity from the Koran. "Verily there are ninety-nine names of God; whoever remembers them shall enter Paradise." At the head of the monument are carved the words "Allah Akbar" (God is great). But the mortal remains of the Great Akbar lie not beneath this tomb, but in a vault beneath the ground floor.

The first apartment of the building is the Sonehri Mahal, or chamber of gold. The sides and ceiling of the vaulted room are in compartments, which bear traces of having been ornamented with flowers, raised in gold, in silver, and enamel. And an inscription in gold raised upon a blue ground runs around it. From the Golden Room a long narrow passage leads to a plain gloomy chamber, and beneath a simple marble tomb lies the Great Akbar. Finch states that the coffin was made of gold.

The Emperor who puts questions of sceptical philosophy to Muslim moulvies, Hindu sages, Christian missionaries, who conversed familiarly with men of letters, and who was a wise and strong ruler, is one of the most striking figures in history. At the time when in England the fires of Smithfield were alight, and men suffered torture and death for their religion, Akbar established entire toleration throughout his dominions. A Muhammadan historian writes:

"Learned men of various kinds and from every country, and professors of many different religions and creeds, assembled at his Court, and were admitted to converse with him. Night and day people did nothing but inquire and investigate. Profound points of science, the subtleties of revelation, the curiosities of history, the wonders of nature, of which large volumes could only give a summary abstract, were ever spoken of. His Majesty collected the opinions of every one, especially of such as were not Mohammedans, retaining whatever he approved of, and rejecting everything which was against his disposition and ran counter to his wishes. From his earliest childhood to his manhood, and from his manhood to old age, his Majesty has passed through the most diverse phases, and through all sorts of religious practices and sectarian beliefs, and has collected everything which people can find in books, with a talent of selection peculiar to him, and a spirit of inquiry opposed to every (Islamic) principle. Thus a faith based on some elementary principles traced itself on the mirror of his heart, and as the result of all the influences which were brought to bear on his Majesty, there grew, gradually as the outline on a stone, the conviction in his heart that there were sensible men in all religions, and abstemious thinkers and men endowed with miraculous powers, among all nations."

The historian adds:

"In A. H. 986 the missionaries of Europe, who are called Padris, and whose chief Pontiff, called Pâpà (Pope), promulgates his interpretations for the use of the people, and who issues mandates that even kings dare not disobey, brought their Gospel to the King's notice, advanced proofs of the Trinity, and affirmed the truth and spread abroad the knowledge of the religion of Jesus. The King ordered Prince Murad to learn a few lessons from the Gospel, and to treat it with all due respect, and Shaikh Abu-l-Fazl was directed to translate it. Instead of the inceptive 'Bismullah,' the following ejaculation was enjoined: 'In nomine Jesu Christe,' that is, 'Oh! thou whose name is merciful and bountiful.' Shaikh Faizi added to this, 'Praise be to God! there is no one like Thee—Thou art He!'"

Akbar not only took an interest in the different sects of the Hindus, but also in their classical language. The learned, but bigoted, Abdul-Kadir states:

"On a third night the King sent for me, and desired me to translate the 'Mahabharat' in conjunction with Nakeb Khan. The consequence was that in three or four months I translated two out of eighteen sections, at the puerile absurdities of which the eighteen thousand creations may well be amazed. Such injunctions as one never heard of. 'What not to eat, and a prohibition against turnips! But such is my fate, to be employed in such works. Nevertheless, I console myself with the reflection that what is predestined must come to pass.'"

However, the other great Indian epic pleased him better, for he writes:

"In this year the King commanded me to make a translation of the Ramayana, a composition superior to the Mahabharat."

The translations from the Sanskrit, which were made by command of Akbar, appear to have been executed under the superintendence of the poet Feizi (most excellent), the brother of the Minister Ab-ul-Fazl (the father of excellence). The two brothers were the Emperor’s dearest friends, and to them he poured out all the doubts and aspirations of his soul. It was Ab-ul-Fazl who persuaded his sovereign “that the seal and asylum of prophecy was no more to be thought of than as an Arab of singular eloquence, and that the sacred inspiration recorded in the Koran were nothing else but fabrications invented by the ever-blessed Mahomed.” To Ab-ul-Fazl we owe the Ain-i-Akbari, or code of regulations drawn up under the direct supervision of his master. It contains the best record of Akbar’s policy and of the conditions of the country under his rule. The brutal murder of his Minister caused the Emperor profound grief, and he survived his faithful servant and friend only three years. In September 1605 after a reign of forty-nine years, almost equal in extent as it was in brilliancy to that of his great contemporary, Elizabeth, Akbar was stricken with a mortal illness. He seemed anxious to die reconciled to the Muslim faith, and a Muslim priest was summoned, who came and read the Muhammadan confession of faith. When finished, Akbar threw his arms round his son’s neck and spoke to him parting words of advice. “My servants and dependants,—When I am gone, do not forget the afflicted in the hour of need. Ponder word for word on all I have said, and again forget me not.” Then the life of the great Akbar—philosopher, warrior, and statesman—ebbed quietly away. His son has left us the following delineation of his intellectual character:

“My father used to hold discourse with learned men of all persuasions, particularly with the Pandits, and was illiterate, yet from constantly conversing with learned and clever persons, his language was so polished, that no one could discover from his conversation that he was entirely uneducated. He understood even the elegancies of poetry and prose so well that it is impossible to conceive any one more proficient.”

The son has also drawn the following graphic portrait of the Emperor:

"He was of middling stature, but with a tendency to be tall, wheat-colour complexion, rather inclining to dark than fair, black eyes and eyebrows, stout body, open forehead and chest, long arms and hands. There was a fleshy wart, about the size of a small pea, on the left side of his nose, which appeared exceedingly beautiful, and which was considered very auspicious by physiognomists, who said it was the sign of immense riches and increasing prosperity. He had a very loud voice, and a very elegant and pleasant way of speech. His manners and habits were quite different from those of other persons, and his visage was full of godly dignity."

Leaving the tomb of Akbar, we drove to another mausoleum beyond the Jumna. It is situated in a walled garden, to which there are four gateways of red granite, ornamented with black and white marble. On a raised platform stands the mausoleum—a square building with an octagonal tower, somewhat squat in proportion, at each corner. The beauty of the building is due to its being entirely built of white marble, and being covered throughout with a mosaic in pietra dura. It was early in the seventeenth century that Italian artists, principally from Florence, taught the Indians the art of inlaying this marble with precious stones, and the tomb of Itimad-ud-Daula is probably one of the first, and certainly one of the most splendid examples of that class of ornamentation in India. It is impossible to agree with the criticism of Fergusson, that, "as one of the first, the tomb of Itimad-ud-Daula was certainly one of the least successful specimens of its class. The patterns do not quite fit the places where they are put, and the spaces are not always those best suited for this style of decoration." The mosaic at this mausoleum is more Oriental, more bold, and more true to nature than the decoration of the screen at the Taj, where Italian influence has debased the art to the

The central chamber there is a marble pavilion on a slightly raised platform. It has a canopy-shaped roof with wide projecting eaves, and is supported on twelve marble pillars with marble screens of exquisite pattern, wrought like lace, between them. In the pavilion are two altar tombs like those in the chamber below, where are interred the remains of Mirza Gheas Bey, a Persian adventurer from Tehran whose surname was Itimad-ud-Daula, and his wife. The sides of the chamber are lined with marble inlaid with mosaic, and the ceiling is most elaborately ornamented with gold and silver, and coloured flowers raised in compartments which are fast becoming tarnished and effaced. The side chambers are panelled with marble, inlaid with mosaic, plain and effective, and the ceilings are adorned with flowers and the graceful long-necked Persian vase. Facing the river there is an ornamental red sandstone building, where we sat and watched the sun bathe the white domes of the Moti Musjid rising above the pink ramparts of the fort. Down below us are the gay waters of the Jumna, and a wide boat laden with straw is floating down the stream. In the far distance, enveloped in a veil of woven light or luminous haze, are the marble dome and minarets of the Taj. The Taj is the expression in marble of wedded love, the Itimad-ud-Daula of filial affection. It was erected by Nur Jehan, who was hardly inferior to Elizabeth in intellectual power, while in beauty and voluptuous grace she was equal to Mary Stuart, to commemorate the memory of her father, Mirza Gheas Bey, who was created Vizier by his Imperial son-in-law, Jehangir. The life of Nur Jehan is a romance from the cradle to the grave. Her father was a native of Tartary, which he quitted to seek his fortune at the Court of Akbar. He was so poor that, placing his wife on a horse, he himself was obliged to perform the journey on foot. Before he reached his destination a daughter was born to him, to whom he gave the name of Nur Mahal, or light of the palace. His talents gained him the favour of Akbar, who made him Chancellor of the Exchequer. The daughter born in the desert grew up to be a woman of surpassing beauty, and one day, when paying a visit to the Queen, she met the heir-apparent, and won his heart by dropping her veil, as if by accident, and in the graceful confusion occasioned by the incident, allowing her beautiful eyes to rest upon his. The young Prince desired to make her his wife, but the Emperor refused to allow the marriage, and tried to put Nur Jehan out of his son’s way by causing her to be married to a young Persian nobleman—Shir Afghan Khan—who received high employment in Bengal. When Jehangir ascended the throne he commanded the divorce of Nur Jehan, but the husband refused, and after several ineffectual attempts the Emperor caused him to be slain. Nur Jehan was brought to Delhi. The Emperor, in a fit of remorse, however, refused to see her, and granted only a paltry allowance for the support of herself and her slaves. To supplement her scanty means, Nur Jehan, who was endowed with ability as well as beauty, proceeded to work pieces of rich embroidery, and to paint silks and sell them to the inmates of the harem. The money gained she spent in embellishing her apartments and adorning her slaves. She herself, to suit the character of a poor widow, affected a plain and simple dress. The fame of her skill and her taste spread far and wide, and reached the ears of the Emperor. His curiosity was aroused, and one day he surprised her in her apartments. She arose and saluted him, and with downcast eyes stood before him attired in simple dress. Her stature, shape, beauty, and voluptuous grace revived the old passion. Astonished at the contrast between her simple attire and the splendour which surrounded her, the Emperor asked: “Why this difference between the Sun of Women and her slaves?” With a woman's wit she replied: “Those born to servitude must dress as it shall please those whom they serve; these are my servants, and I lighten the burden of bondage by every indulgence in my power, but I, who am your slave, O Emperor, of the world, must dress according to your pleasure and not my own." The gentle sarcasm pleased the Emperor, and the reconciliation was complete. Nur Mahal became the wife of Jehangir, and from the day she was married she virtually took the reins of government into her own hands. A Muhammadan historian writes:
CITIES OF INDIA

"Day by day her influence and dignity increased. First of all she received the title of Noor Mahal, 'Light of the Harem,' but was afterwards distinguished by that of Noor Jahan Begam, 'Light of the World.' All her relations and connexions were raised to honour and wealth... No grant of lands was conferred upon any one except under her seal. In addition to giving her the titles that other kings bestow, the Emperor granted Noor Jahan the rights of sovereignty and government. Sometimes she would sit in the balcony of her palace, while the nobles would present themselves, and listen to her dictates. Coin was struck in her name, with this superscription: 'By order of the King Jehangir, gold has a hundred splendours added to it by receiving the impression of the name of Noor Jahan, the Queen Begam.' On all farmanas also receiving the Imperial signature the name of 'Noor Jahan, the Queen Begam,' was jointly attached. At last her authority reached such a pass that the King was such only in name. Repeatedly he gave out that he had bestowed the sovereignty on Noor Jahan Begam, and would say, 'I require nothing beyond a sir of wine and half a sir of meat.' It is impossible to describe the beauty and wisdom of the Queen. In any matter that was presented to her, if a difficulty arose, she immediately solved it. Whoever threw himself upon her protection was preserved from tyranny and oppression; and if ever she learnt that any orphan girl was destitute and friendless, she would bring about her marriage, and give her a wedding portion. It is probable that during her reign no less than 500 orphan girls were thus married and portioned."

After leaving the tomb of Itimad-ud-Daula we re-cross the old pontoon bridge, and proceeding down the road which skirts the river we reach the great goal of our pilgrimage—the Taj. No building has been more often described, drawn, and photographed. But no drawing or photograph can give any idea of so rich and poetical a subject. No description can shadow forth the whole, combined out of marble dome, fair minarets, and fragrant garden. Words cannot express the multitudinous richness of its ornamentation, perfection of form, and minuteness of decoration, each lending assistance to the other. This is the true charm of the Taj. It is like unto one of those daughters of the gods who were most divinely fair. It is the fashion now to say that the Taj is lacking in strict architectural beauty. A well known writer states: "The truth is that the Taj is not an architectural group altogether satisfactory." No doubt in parts of the Taj genius is brought into jeopardy by unskilfulness; but the divine gift prevails. If a man possesses the sentiment of form the Taj will please him. As we sit on the steps of one of the minarets in the cool air of the evening and gaze upon the marble dome, and the smooth, broad front of marble, warm in the rays of the setting sun, across the memory comes Keats' line—"In form and shape, compact and beautiful." What has been said of Keats' St. Agnes Eve may be applied to the Taj—"A monody of dreamy richness."
CITIES OF INDIA

FATTEHPUR-SIKRI

The air is crisp and bright on the December morning we leave Agra to drive to Fattehpur-Sikri. We pass fields waving in green wheat, with patches of bright red poppies scattered about. From them there comes the monotonous wail of the ryot's song as he drives the bullocks that draw the water from the well, and from the cluster of bushes there arises the shrill cry of the partridge. Peasants strong and well knit, and young girls with graceful figures, are tramping to the town to sell their produce. Fine white oxen with spreading horns dragging heavy carts go by. Large substantial villages are passed and naked urchins with large eyes ask for bucksheesh as we stop at the roadside well to change horses. Then we see in the horizon a stone wall with battlements and round towers, and within it rises a rocky high ridge crowned with buildings. This is Fattehpur-Sikri, the summer residence of the great Akbar. The legend of its foundation is familiar to all. Akbar returning from one of his campaigns halted at the foot of the hill. At this time he and his wife—a Hindu princess of the Jeyapore family—were in deep grief at the loss of their twin children. On the top of the hill resided a very famous and holy hermit, Shekh Salem Chishli, who promised them a son and heir if they would take up their abode at the place. They consented, and either the salubrity of the air or the spiritual exertions of the holy Father led to the birth of a son, who was called Salem, which name he bore till he mounted the throne as Emperor Jehangir. The tomb of the holy man stands on the highest part of the plateau, and is surrounded by high red walls, which gave it the appearance of a fortress. Approaching it from the Dafter Khāna, or Record Office, of Akbar, now used as a travellers' bungalow, we come to a fine gateway, passing through which we enter a quadrangle of about five hundred feet square, with a very lofty and majestic cloister all round. Bishop Heber rightly said that there is no quadrangle either in Oxford or Cambridge fit to be compared with it, either in size or majestic proportions or beauty of architecture. Opposite rises a majestic mosque, and on the right is the marble mausoleum of the Saint, surrounded by the tombs of his descendants. "One cannot but feel deeply impressed on entering this silent and deserted court; the long sombre galleries, surmounted by a thousand cupolas; the gigantic gateway resembling a propylon of Karnak; and the noble mosque which forms a dark red framework to the mausoleum of the Saint, the dazzling whiteness of which is heightened by the foliage of the trees overhanging it. In the whole effect there is a mixture of severe grandeur and soft harmony which has always characterized Indian Islamism." The tomb of the Saint is entirely of white marble, and the walls are nothing but a curtain carved in open fretwork of the most exquisite geometrical patterns. A deep cornice of marble upheld by brackets of the most elaborate Hindu design intercept the rays of the sun. Behind an inner screen inlaid with mother-of-pearl, is the sarcophagus of the Saint, which is also inlaid with mother-of-pearl and covered with rich stuffs. Numerous dirty strings are tied in the holes of the screen. They have been placed there by women who are desirous that the spirit of the Saint should do for them what the prayers of the Saint did for the wife of Akbar. Near the tomb is the mosque which Fergusson considers to be one of the finest in India. A chronogram over the main arch informs us that it is the duplicate of the Holy Place at Mecca, and that it was built in 1571. It is crowned with three domes, and a handsome arch leads to the central chapel, whose vaulted roof is ornamented with a variety of geometrical patterns painted in the most delicate tints, and the floor is paved with marble. On each side of the central mosque are chapels with lofty square Hindu pillars. From the mosque we proceed to the great northern gateway. But to speak of it as a gateway conveys no meaning of the building. It is a triumphal arch, and compared with it the Arch of Constantine or the Arch of Titus is poor. It was erected to commemorate the conquest of Khandesh by Akbar. An inscription below the spring of the arches illustrates how the pride and arrogance of the Muslim is united with extreme religious humility. In the height of his triumph the victorious Emperor remembered, ‘‘Said Jesus, on whom be peace! The world is a bridge; pass over it, but build no house on it. He who hopeth for an hour, may hope for an eternity. The world is but an hour, spend it in devotion, the rest is unseen.’’ Passing through a half domical entrance we reach some lofty steps, from which we look down upon ruined palaces and mosques encircled by the walls of the Imperial city; and beyond the stone battlements stretches a green country, and the monotony of the wide plain is broken by the dim outlines of blue hills. Descending the steps and walking through a narrow lane we arrive at an old mosque, which probably had once been a Hindu temple, for it is entirely Hindu in its character, and between Hindu pillars have been inserted arches. The curved brackets are exactly similar to those in the Saint’s tomb. It is said that the mosque was built by the stone-cutters of the neighbourhood for Salem, and that here he taught his disciples. Near the mosque is an enclosure with a tomb, where lies buried Salem’s son. Legend states that the infant one day noticed his sire was dejected. Though only six months of age and he had never spoken before, he sat up in his cradle and asked his father the cause of his grief. The Saint replied: "Oh, my son, it is written that the Emperor will never have a son unless some other man will sacrifice for him the life of his own heir; and surely no one is capable of such an act." "If you will allow me," cried the child, "I will die in order that his Majesty may be consoled." And before the father could reply the obliging infant expired. Nine months later Jehangir was born.

Leaving the tomb of the precocious infant we again mount the steps and devote some time to looking at the fine outer arch, which has a character of elegance combined with boldness of invention. The grey and pink sandstone columns, the marble ornaments, the bold flowing Arabic characters on the white ground, all lend grace to one of the finest portals in the world. This was the opinion of Finch, who visited it two centuries ago. He writes:

"At the head of this street stands the King’s house, or Moholl, with much curious building: beyond which, on an ascent, is the goodliest mosque in all the east. It has a flight of some twenty-four or thirty steps to the gate, which is, in my opinion, one of the loftiest and handsomest in the world, having a great number of clustering pyramids on the top, very curiously disposed. The top of this gate may be distinctly seen from the distance of eight or ten miles. Within the gate is a spacious court curiously paved with stone, about six times the size of the Exchange of London, with a fine covered walk along the sides, more than twice as broad and double the height of those in our London Exchange, supported by numerous pillars all of one stone; and all around about are entrances into numerous rooms very ingeniously contrived. Opposite the grand gate stands a fair and sumptuous tomb, most artificially inlaid with mother-o’-pearl and inclosed by a stone balustrade curiously carved, the ceiling being curiously plastered and painted. In this tomb is deposited the body of a calender or Mahometan devotee, at whose cost the whole of this splendid mosque was built. Under the courtyard is a goodly tank of excellent water; none other being to be had in the whole extent of the city, except brackish and corroding, by the use of which so great a mortality was occasioned among the inhabitants of this city, that Akbar left it before it was quite finished, and removed his seat of empire to Agra, so that this splendid city was built and ruined in the space of fifty or sixty years."

Leaving the mosque and passing the houses of Akbar's two great friends—Ab-ul-Fazl, the compiler of the Ain-i-Akbari, and his brother the poet, we enter by a lofty and richly carved gate a large quadrangle, on the north and south sides of which are a series of apartments roofed with sloping slabs covered with blue enamel. This is called the Jehangir Mahal or Jodh Bhai Mahal, on the supposition that it was the residence of the Hindoo princess Jodh Bhai, the mother of Jehangir. Jodh Bhai was, however, the wife and not the mother of Jehangir. Who was the mother of Jehangir is uncertain, but her son reverently informs us that she was called Mariam Zamanah, or Mary of the Period, thus showing the respect with which she was regarded, for the Muhammadans hold in reverence the memory of the Virgin Mary. To this circumstance is probably due the legend that Akbar had a Christian wife called Bibi Manum. From the palace we proceed to what is supposed to have been the Christian lady's residence, and over the door one is shown what is supposed to have been an Annunciation. But it is so faded that it is difficult to make out the figures, and the frescoes, which tradition says represented scenes from Firdusi's poem the Shah-nama, have faded beyond hope of restoration. The house was once profusely gilded and painted, from which it derived its name, Sonehri Manzil, or Golden Palace. Akbar may have wished that the residence of his Hindu consort should surpass in magnificence the residence built almost opposite by Rajah Birbal for his daughter. The Hindu Minister had won the heart of the Emperor by his wit and love of letters, and it was he who led his master from the straight path of orthodoxy. The house he erected for his daughter

proves that he had a keen appreciation of the beautiful. But it does not seem to be a house, but a casket in red sandstone, carved and ornamented after the pattern of some ebony or sandalwood casket. Not a piece of wood is used in the whole edifice, but the whole building and its entire ornamentation remind us that the Hindu architects loved to imitate their old structures, which were entirely of wood. Wood lent itself to the Hindu genius for elaborate ornamentation, for it could with facility be carved. At Fattelpur-Sikri the Hindu found red sandstone so soft that it could be easily chiselled clean and sharp; and he covered every inch of it with ornaments perfect in taste and design. But his love of ornament led him sometimes to outwardly curve a stone bracket meant to represent a wooden truss, and so destroyed the impression of reality and durability. The limitation and strength of the Hindu intellect is vividly illustrated in his architecture. He is endowed with great powers of analysis, and a rich imagination which displays itself in the variety and richness of his work, but he is lacking in the power of invention. He laid a large slab across his columns of stone, and he made the whole beautiful by rich carving; but he never thought of creating the radiating arch, and its complement, the radiating dome. The rooms in the upper story of Birbal’s house are, it is true, crowned by massive domes, but these are due to Muhammadan influence. The ceilings of the rooms below, fifteen feet square, are constructed of slabs fifteen feet in length and one foot in breadth, which rest upon bold cornices supported by deeply arched pendentives. The rooms are examples of the best and most perfect manual skill, and it is impossible not to admire them, because the work is good and strong and the ornaments so finished; but it is not certain that the ugly goblins and formless monsters carved on an old cathedral front do not give more pleasure. There is the joy of life and vigour about them;
but Birbal's house affords one only sensuous delight. Near it rises a fanciful construction called Panch Mahal—the "five palaces"—which consists of four platforms each smaller than the one beneath, and supported on rows of columns which diminish in number from fifty supporting the ground floor to four supporting the small kiosque. The thirty-five columns which support the second terrace are all different, and illustrate the way the Hindu architect treated the pillar. Unlike the Greeks and Romans, who make their columns always round, the Hindu constructed his of every shape. There is also no fixed intercolumniation in the Hindu architecture, as is found in the Grecian, but the spaces allowed between pillar and pillar in different Hindu buildings are found nearly to coincide with the Grecian mode of intercolumniation, though in many instances they differ widely from it; and the same, perhaps, may be said of the Egyptian colonnades. "The Indian pedestals and bases are made more systematically, and afford by far a greater variety of proportions and ornaments than the Grecian and Roman. In the European architecture the form and dimensions of the pedestals and bases are fixed by invariable rules, with respect to the orders in which they are employed; but in the Indian the choice is left to the option of the artists. The capitals of the Grecian columns invariably mark the distinction of the several orders: those of the Indian are varied at pleasure, though not without regard to the diameters and length of the shaft; and the forms of the plainest of them, though they have nothing in common with the Grecian order, are found, at a distant view, to bear some resemblance to the Doric and Ionic capitals; but those of a more elaborate kind are sometimes so overloaded with a sort of filigree ornament as to destroy the effect of the beautiful proportion of the whole." There has been some discussion as to the use of the Panch Mahal, since it could not have been used as a habitation, and commanding a view of the Harem, strangers could not have been admitted to it. But it must be borne in mind that Eastern despots did not erect buildings merely from consideration of use. This elaborate and quaint erection moreover may have been constructed to enable the Emperor to enjoy the cool air on a summer’s night.

From the Panch Mahal we entered the Khas Mahal, and walking to the south we arrive at the Khwabgah, or sleeping place. Ascending a narrow staircase we come to a small, well-proportioned room of red sandstone without any ornament. This was the bedroom of the Great Akbar. Opposite is the light and elegant Diwan-i-Khas with its handsome balcony and well carved balustrades. On the left is a small red building used as a girls’ school. Above it towers the elegant Panch Mahal. On the right is the apartment occupied by Akbar’s chief wife, Ruquina Sultana Begam. Descending the steps we walk across the court to it. Upon the decoration of this little palace, the Hindu has concentrated all his powers of imagination and invention. Here we see the splendid caprice of the East. Here is carved in stone the rich and lavish life of the tropics. On the panels round the room the Hindu has carved the palm, beneath whose trunk, according to Moslem tradition, was born the holy Son of Mary, and the cypress which grew in the Moslem’s terrestrial paradise, and we have cunningly wrought pheasants perching on trees, and the tiger wandering through the jungle. The vine and the pomegranate clasp the shafts. The roof is carved in geometrical patterns as rich and careful as the skill of man can make them. From each door we gaze on two pillars, also luxuriantly carved, and the bright light of the sun falls upon the cool green leaves of the graceful neem tree. The jewelled and enamelled marble caskets which Shah Jehan constructed for his mistress excite admiration by their voluptuous beauty, and about the Taj hovers the poetry of death: about the apartment of the Stamboul Begum hovers the poetry of love.

With deep regret we left it and walked to the Diwan-i-Am, a small redstone hall, with a deep redstone balcony, on each side of which is a redstone screen. To this balcony Akbar arrayed in robes of State used to repair each day and inquire into and redress the grievances of the people who used to crowd the courtyard below. It was here he used to receive the strangers who used to flock to his court from all parts of the earth. Here he received the Jesuits of Goa who brought him the leaves and seeds of tobacco, and it was at Fatehpur-Sikri the hookah is supposed to have been invented. From the Diwan-i-Am the Emperor passed to the Diwan-i-Khas, or Privy Council Chamber. It is a lofty hall, in the centre of which is an enormous column of red sandstone, which terminates at some distance from the ceiling in a capital richly carved in the Hindu style. This capital forms a platform encircled by a light balustrade, and from it radiate four stone causeways leading to four niches in the buildings. Legend states that the Emperor used to take his seat on the platform, his Ministers occupying the niches, while the ambassadors, commanders, and nobles, who had to transact business, remained below. It is also supposed that this hall is the place mentioned by Badaoni, where Akbar held his religious controversies. We have mention of a building as possessing four aiwans, one for each class of religionists, and it is possible that the disputants occupied the four corners, while the Emperor sat in the middle. Wearied of work or religious controversy, the Emperor proceeded, when the heat of the afternoon began to decline, to the court nigh at hand, marked out by alternate squares of black and white marble as a puchisi-board. The game is played by four players with four pawns apiece, and the moves are regulated by throwing three long dice, the highest throws being twenty-five, from which the game derives its name. The object of the game is to get one’s four pawns into the centre square of the board. Akbar played it in an Imperial manner with sixteen handsome slave girls as pawns. North of the puchisi-board is the Ankh Michauli, or hide-and-seek place, where it is said Jehangir used to play at hide-and-seek as a child. Judging from the building it was more probably used as a treasury. Close to the Ankh Michauli is a small platform shaded by a canopy, where, according to tradition, sat a Hindu teacher tolerated by Akbar. It is a building of the purest Jain architecture, each of the architraves being supported by two highly carved struts issuing from the mouths of monsters and meeting in the middle.

From the Khas Mahal we proceed to a large quadrangular building known as the Mint. It is a kind of barbican with a large number of dark vaults and a hall described as the Hall of Account. The writer of that rare work, The Wanderings of a Pilgrim, states:

"The taksal (the mint) is at this place; in it rupees were first coined; unlike the circular rupees of the present day, those coined by Akbar are square; he also coined square gold mohurs and eight anna pieces of the same form. The square rupee, if without a blemish, is reckoned of great value; it is used in conjuring the truth out of thieves, who are much afraid of it, and often confess the truth from a belief in its virtues. If a rich native can obtain one of Akbar’s rupees, or, what is better, an Akbarabadee gold mohur, he puts it away with his hoard of riches, firmly believing that by its virtue robbers will be prevented from discovering his gold."

Forbes, in his Oriental Memoirs, tells us that Akbar restricted the coinage of gold to four places—Agra, Bengal, Ahmedabad, and Cabul. Silver coin was allowed to be struck in fourteen cities, including the preceding four; mints for copper coin were appointed in twenty-eight cities.
CITIES OF INDIA

“Great attention was paid to assaying and refining the various metals and to every department of the mint and treasury. The gold and silver intended for the current coin of the realm, when brought to the greatest degree of purity, was committed to the most celebrated artists, to give each specimen the perfection of beauty. It is well known that coins, medals, and signets of the Mahometan princes have no portrait or armorial bearings cut in the die from which the coin is to be stamped, as is generally practised in Europe: it is usually impressed with the name of the reigning monarch, the date of the year in the Hegira, and perhaps some appropriate or flattering title. In the reign of Akbar were struck those immense gold masses, distinguished as the immortal coins. The largest, called Henseh, weighed upwards of one hundred tolahs, in value one hundred jilaly mohurs, not much short of two hundred pounds sterling, estimating the gold mohur at fifteen silver rupees of half a crown each; others were of half that value; from which they diminished to the small round mohur, valued at nine silver rupees; some of these were marked with flowers, especially the tulip and the rose, but never with the representation of any animated form. In the place of such emblems, Akbar had moral sentences and tetrastichs from the Persian poets, the praises of the Almighty, or his own titles, engraved on the die in a most beautiful manner.” On the reverse of the Henseh was written: “The best coin is that which is employed in supplying men with the necessaries of life, and that benefits the companions in the road to God.” On some of the smaller coins were the following inscriptions in Persian characters, some of them ornamented with a tulip and wild rose: “God is greatest!” on the reverse, “O Defender,” “God is greatest! mighty is His glory!” with the date.

As we leave the Mint to return to Birbal’s house, where we are going to spend the night, the sun begins to sink swiftly down the horizon, and the people returning from the fields drive their cattle through the deserted streets, and flocks of goats come up through the lanes, and crop the bushes that are now springing from the palaces of Akbar. Then the sky, soft and tender as an Italian one, is tremulous with starlight, and the moon rises above the horizon like a ball of fire. Swiftly she mounts the sky and whitens the country below, and spreads sheets of light over the dark mosques and deserted palaces of the city. This is India not of heat, toil, and cruel separation, but of romance and beauty. But the very beauty only lends itself to sad thoughts, for as we gaze on the boundless starlit depths overhead, there comes to us—

"The selfsame song that found a path
Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
She stood in tears amid the alien corn,
    The same that oft-times hath Charm'd magic casements, opening on the foam
    Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn"
WITHIN fifty years after the death of Aurangzeb, the foundations of the Empire which Baber created and Akbar, Jehangir and Shan Jehan consolidated, were undermined to the centre and the Viceroy of the provinces established independent kingdoms for themselves. In the south the Turki Chin Kilich Khan, better known as Nizam-ul-Mulk (Regulator of the Kingdom), a capable commander of great personal courage and proud spirit, made himself de facto sovereign of the wide dominion which his descendants, the Nizams of Hyderabad, govern this day. In Hindustan the Persian Sádat Khan, whose original name was Muhammad Amin, carved out of the great Gangetic plain the modern kingdom of Oude. Dow, the historian, spoke of his grandson as "the infamous son of a yet more infamous Persian pedlar," a phrase which raised the ire of Burke. Sádat Khan's ancestors were, as Burke stated, "of noble descent," tracing their origin to the Prophet himself: and they had been long settled at Naishapur in Khorásán. His father had served the Moghul Emperor, and on the son coming to India he was appointed by the Emperor, Governor of Agra. He took an important part in the overthrow of the Saiads,¹ and for his services he was appointed by the Emperor Muhammad Shah, Subahdar of Oude (1720).¹ Historians do not agree as to whether Sádat Khan in concert with Nizam-ul-Mulk, called in the Persian soldier of fortune, Nadir Shah, but there is no doubt that their rivalry led to the defeat of the Moghul Army at Kurnal (1738) and the subsequent sack of Delhi. Sádat Khan was taken prisoner and died before the close of the year. "Ajodhya (the ancient capital) and Lucknow were the places at which he chiefly resided, and having assumed for his crest the fish which is still, so to speak, the arms of Oude, he changed the name of the well known fort of Lucknow from Kila Likna (so called after the founder, one Likna Ahur) to Machi Bhawan or the fish-house." Sádat was succeeded by his nephew and son-in-law, who was appointed by the Moghul Emperor, Vizier of the Empire, or Prime Minister, and so was the first to be called Nawab Vizier; but he lost the favour of the Emperor and was superseded as Premier of the Empire by Ghazi-ud-din, the grandson of Nizam-ul-Mulk. He retired to his own kindgom and died in 1756. He was succeeded by his son, Shuja-ud-daulah, who had married the Bhow Begum, a Persian lady, but by no means, as Burke alleged, "of the first birth and quality in India," for her grandfather had been Aurangzeb's head cook. Her grievances have been immortalized by the fervid oratory of the accusers of Warren Hastings. But those who knew her describe her as a woman of uncommonly violent temper. "Death and destruction is the least menace she denounces upon the most trifling opposition to her caprice." Her main object was the extirpation of the English and their power in Hindustan. Her husband, jealous of their growing ascendancy on the coast, and having the Nawab of Mursheda bad and the titular Emperor of Delhi in his camp, thought the opportunity favourable for an invasion of Bengal. At Buxar on the Ganges, he and his army of fifty thousand men were met by Hector Munro with a small force. Shuja-ud-daulah, after a bloody contest, was signally defeated, and his camp and one hundred and sixty guns enriched the victorious troops. It is the battle of Buxar and not the rout at Plassey which laid the foundation of our Empire. It broke the power of the Nawab of Oude; it led to the Moghul Emperor coming to our camp to negotiate; and it took our arms across the Ganges into the wide central plain of India. Clive having assumed under a grant from the Emperor of Delhi the direct revenue administration of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, congratulated his masters on "having become the sovereigns of three kingdoms," but to extend their possessions further would be "a scheme so extravagantly ambitious that no government in its senses would dream of it." He determined to restore to the Nawab Vizier, Oude, Ghazepoor and Benares, and to maintain and strengthen the new state as the buffer state between Bengal and the Mahrattas and the Afghans. The districts of Korah and Allahabad were given to the titular Moghul Emperor, who thus became a dependant of the Bengal Government.

On January 26, 1775, Shuja-ud-daulah died and was succeeded by his son, Asaf-ud-daulah. The majority of the council at Calcutta considered all the treaties made with Shuja-ud-daulah as purely personal, and consequently invalid on the death of one of the contracting parties. They therefore resolved to make a heavier bargain with his successor, and Philip Francis, who had denounced Hastings for "letting out British troops for hire to the Vizier," determined to increase the amount that the Nawab had to pay for them. Hastings expressed an opinion that the present subsidy was sufficient and that it ought not to be increased. "I doubt," he stated, "whether a larger sum would in reality prove a gain to the Company." It was however resolved that an increase of the subsidy be demanded from the Nawab to make it equal to the expenses of the troops. Thus we find the statesman, who has been branded as a violator of treaties and the oppressor of natives by extortions and exactions, doing his utmost to prevent his colleagues from extorting any concession from a native prince inconsistent with a former treaty.¹ A fresh treaty was extracted from the Nawab: the subsidy was raised; all arrears due by his father were to be paid by him, and he was forced to cede to the Company the province of Benares, valued at more than two hundred thousand pounds a year. The burden imposed upon the Nawab by the Francis Junto, and his own extravagant debauchery, first led to the internal confusion and financial straits which became chronic in Oude. To his wild expenditure Lucknow however owes some of her finest buildings—the Imambara, the Rumi Darwaza, the Char Bagh, and the Residency. He was an incompetent ruler, but his liberality and munificence won the hearts of his subjects. In 1797 Asaf-ud-daulah died and his putative son being put aside by Sir John Shore, then Governor-General, his brother, Safadat Ali, was placed on the Musnad. A fresh treaty was made between him and Sir John Shore. The fort of Allahabad was handed over to the British Government, and in return the Company agreed to maintain not less than ten thousand troops in Oude. If at any time however the force amounted to more than thirteen thousand or less than eight thousand, an increased subsidy was to be paid or a decrease allowed accordingly. Soon after the treaty was signed, Lord Mornington, afterwards Marquess Wellesley, became Governor-General. Among the dangers which threatened India at that time was the invasion of Zaman Shah, the reigning sovereign of Afghanistan. The Mahrattas refused to enter into an offensive alliance with the Governor-General. The ruler of Oude—our buffer state—was totally incapable of resisting an invader. The English Commander-in-Chief reported that, while the danger of an invasion was great, the Nawab's army was not only a heavy drain on his finances but a real and formidable danger to the British Government. "Towards the close of 1799," writes the Duke of Wellington, in a memorandum on his brother's Government of India,

"the Governor-General, acting under the treaty of his predecessor, called upon the Nawab of Oude to dismiss his expensive, useless, and dangerous troops and to fill their places by increased numbers of the Company's troops." The King evaded the demand, and delayed, but after many difficulties, arrangements were made for introducing into his territories 3,000 additional troops at his expense. A reform of the Civil administration was also pressed on the Nawab. He now declared that he was not able to pay the subsidy, and Lord Wellesley determined to place it on the basis of territorial security. After a long negotiation a fresh treaty was signed on November 10, 1801, "by which in commutation for subsidy and for the perpetual defence of his country," the Nawab ceded Rohilcund, the Lower Doab, between the Ganges and the Jumna, and a large extent of country between the Ganges and the river Gogra down to Benares. The two former were, as Wellington says, his frontier provinces towards the Mahrattas, the Sikhs and the Afghans; the latter state bordered upon the dominion of the Company. The policy of Wellesley with regard to Oude has been warmly criticized.
But a dispassionate study of the State documents clearly shows that while he acted for the safety of India he acted at the same time with due regard to the faith of existing treaties and what was due to the people and sovereign of Oude. It would have been better for the people if he could have annexed the kingdom. The condition of the country rapidly grew worse. Thirty years after Wellesley's treaty the Court of Directors remarked "it was the British Government which, by a systematic suppression of all attempts at resistance, had prolonged the misrule, which became permanent when the short-sightedness and rapacity of a semi-barbarous Government was armed with the military strength of a civilized one.” Lord William Bentinck, who had travelled through the country and represented to the East India Court its desolation and decay, was authorized to assume at once the government if it were necessary. But the Governor-General was a man of singular moderation, and unfortunately for the people of Oude he did not avail himself of the permission granted him. He merely informed the King of the instructions he had received, and stated that their execution would be suspended in the hope of his adopting the necessary reforms. It was a vain hope. The character of the Nawab Nasir-ud-din was stained with every vice, and his life was consumed in low debauchery. The King’s barber was the greatest man of the court. “His influence was far greater than that of the native Prime Minister.” He had come out to Calcutta as a cabin-boy. Having been brought up a hairdresser in London, he had left his ship on arriving in Calcutta to resume his old business. Making some money he took to going up the river with European merchandise for sale. Arrived at Lucknow he delighted the King by the way he curled his hair. “Honours and wealth were showered upon the lucky coiffeur. He was given a title of nobility. Sofraz Khan (“the illustrious chief”) was his new name, and men bowed to him in Oude. “The power of the barber waxed daily greater. His pride increased with his power; and no limits were set to the caprices and wild pranks of despotic authority and reckless depravity combined. The scenes which occurred in the palace were whispered over India. His majesty might one hour be seen in a state of drunken nudity with his boon companions and the low menial who was his chief confidant; at another, he would parade the streets of Lucknow, drunk at midday, driving one of his own elephants. All decency and propriety were banished from the court.” On the night of July 7, 1837, Nasir-ud-din died, and the chief Begum attempted to place on the Musnad his putative son, Munna Jan. “During the twelve hours’ tumult that ensued, the Resident, his suite, and the rightful heir to the throne, were all in the hands of an infuriated mob. Armed soldiers with lighted torches and lighted matchlocks in their hands, held possession of the palace, stalked throughout its premises, and spared no threats against the British authorities, if they did not assent to the installation of their creature, Munna Jan. The nearest succour had to come five miles from the cantonment. Five companies of Sepoys, with four guns, however, soon arrived. The Resident managed to join his friends. He then gave the insurgents one quarter of an hour’s grace. When that had expired, the guns opened, and a few rounds of grape were thrown into the disorderly mass, who thronged the palace and its enclosures. Morning dawned on an altered scene; the rioters had succumbed or dispersed; the dead were removed; the palace was cleared out; and by ten o’clock in the forenoon, the aged, infirm, and trembling heir to the crown was seated on the throne that, at midnight, had been occupied by the usurper. The Resident placed the crown on the new King’s head, and the event was announced to the people of Lucknow by the very guns which a few hours before had carried death and consternation among the Oude soldiery.” The new sovereign, Muhammad Ali Khan, was a respectable old man who made some earnest efforts to improve his kingdom. But the period of improvement was most brief. He was succeeded by his son, Amjad Ali, a man of frivolous disposition, who would not attend to business or to any advice. On his death in February, 1847, Wajid Ali, “the last and, with the exception of Nasir-ud-din, perhaps the most despicable of his line, mounted the throne.” In November, 1847, Lord Hardinge visited Lucknow, and administered to Wajid Ali

the same rebuke and the same warning which had been addressed to his predecessors. He was told that if a marked improvement were not visible in two years the Company would assume the government of Oude. Not two years, but nine years, rolled on, and no improvement was made in the Government. Then on February 13, 1856, the Province of Oude was annexed on the righteous ground that "the British Government would be guilty in the sight of God and man, if it were any longer to aid in sustaining by its countenance an administration fraught with evil to millions." The country was constituted into a chief Commissionship, and the first efforts of British Administration were guided by the tender and generous hands of Sir James Outram. But his health unfortunately broke down under the heavy strain of work, and in April, 1856, he was obliged to resign the rule of the province and return to England. Outram's successor, in attempting with the most laudable intentions to introduce into the new province the Revenue administration of the elder districts, alienated all the great landlords and inspired general discontent and misgiving. Lord Canning, having become to a certain degree aware of the feeling which had spread through the province, sent Henry Lawrence to Oude that he might conciliate the hearts of the inhabitants by his justice and tact; but it was too late. The object for which he had been sent was in a fair way of accomplishment when the great storm burst, and Henry Lawrence knew that upon his success or failure depended the vital interests of the Empire. And from the first overt act of mutiny on May 3, 1857, to the hour of his death, there was nothing left undone by Henry Lawrence to stem the tide of revolt and to maintain the British authority. It was the courage and steadfastness with which he had inspired all around him, and the wise precautions which he had taken with regard to the supplies and food, which enabled the heroic garrison of Lucknow to baffle all the efforts of their enemy.
CITIES OF INDIA

The Residency entrenchments, in which Henry Lawrence concentrated his small force, covered almost sixty acres of ground, and consisted of a number of detached houses, public edifices, outhouses, and casual buildings, netted together and welded by ditches, parapets, stockades and batteries into one consentaneous whole of resistance. On the summit of the plateau stood the Residency proper, the official residence of the Chief Commissioner, a lofty building three stories high, not without grace and dignity. A superb portico gave a considerable degree of grandeur to the eastern entrance, and a wide and lofty colonnaded verandah extended along the western front. Near the Residency stood another large pile of building called the Banqueting Hall, where large and spacious apartments had been built for state receptions. Passing through the Bailey Guard Gate, now riddled with bullets, we come to a ruined building, and in one of the rooms a notice informs us, "Here Sir H. Lawrence died." This ruined building was the extensive one-storied house, occupied by Dr. Fayrer, the Residency Surgeon. Here many ladies found a hospitable shelter, and it had the advantage of having underground rooms to which they could retire when the fire of the enemy became heavy. Along the flat roof were placed sandbags, and sheltered by them our men were able to return the fire of the foe. The post was commanded by Captain Weston and Dr. Fayrer, a keen sportsman and a first-rate shot. It was on the second day of the siege, while Henry Lawrence was discussing with Captain Wilson, the Deputy-Assistant Adjutant-General, a memorandum as to how the rations were to be distributed, that a shell entered his apartment in the Residency, burst, and gave him a mortal wound. As the Residency had become a special target for the enemy they removed the wounded man to Dr. Fayrer's house, which was more sheltered from their artillery. They laid him in the northern verandah. A consultation was held, and the medical men decided that even amputation at the hip joint offered no hope of saving life; nothing could be done but to alleviate suffering. The rebels had learned what had occurred, and whither the chief had been removed, and they smote the house with a smashing fire. "As his time drew near, Sir Henry asked to receive the Lord's Supper; and in the verandah, with the shells hissing through the air, and the pillars crashing to the stroke of the bullets, the holy rite was performed. When it was ended, with a calm fortitude which excited the admiration of those about him, he appointed his successor, and gave detailed instructions as to the conduct of the defence. He earnestly exhorted them to preserve internal tranquillity, to economize their ammunition and the supplies, to protect the women and children from all evil, to exert themselves indelugibly to rouse and sus-tain the spirit of the garrison, never to treat with the enemy, and on on account to surrender. He expressed his wishes with regard to his children, sending loving messages to them. The children of the British soldiers, who had been the special object of his charity, he recommended to the care of his country. His fancy then reverted to the happy days of his own childhood spent with his mother. He spoke often of the devoted wife who had gone before him, and he repeated the sacred texts which had been their guide and their comfort. In the hour of rebellion there came home to him, whose heart was full of compassion and charity for all humanity, the words inscribed on her tomb:

'To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against Him.' He expressed a wish to be buried 'without any fuss' and to be laid in the same grave as the British soldier; and he desired that no epitaph should be placed on his tomb, but this: 'Here lies Henry Lawrence, who tried to do his duty. May God have mercy on him.'" 1

Directly below Fayrer's house we find on the east front a pillar with "Financial Post" written on it. It is the first of a series of pillars which mark the different important posts held by the garrison. Here stood the Financial Commissioner's office, a large two-storied house, the enclosure wall of which formed a part of our line of defence. It was commanded with great ability by Captain Saunders, 18th Native Infantry. A little to the west of the "Financial Post" we come to "Sago's Post," where stood the house of Mrs. Sago, the mistress of a charity school. It was a small low building, the enclosing walls and grounds of which were abandoned and the defence confined to the house itself. A narrow passage, to traverse which proved fatal to many during the siege, led up to the Judicial Commissioner's office, a large two-storied building situated on high ground. Here the outer wall, owing to the slope of the ground, had to be abandoned, and a strong barricade of fascines and earth constructed. This important position, which was greatly exposed to the enemy's fire from the east, was commanded by Captain Germon, 13th Native Infantry. Next to the Judicial Commissioner's office came "Captain Anderson's Post." This was a small house, situated on rising ground, and formed the south-eastern angle of our position. When the Residency was being put in a state of defence, the wall of the enclosure round the house was thrown down, and a stockade erected in its place. Within the stockade was a ditch; then came a mound about five feet high; then another deep ditch with pointed bamboos placed at the bottom. Having the enemy only a few yards from the house on the left, and in front, it was one of the most exposed outworks of the whole Residency position. Below it, and communicating with it by a hole in the wall, was the Cawnpore Battery. Captain Anderson has left a graphic description

"Again and again they made the attempt, but back they had to go by a steady fire. Their chiefs came to the front, and shouted out, 'Come on, come on—the place is ours—it is taken.' And the Sepoys would then rush forward, then hesitate, and finally got under cover of the stockade, and kept up a fearful fire. Some hundreds of them got under the Cawnpore Battery, but found the hand-grenades rather disagreeable, and had to bolt rather sharp. Poor Major Banks came up, and cheered us during the hottest fire, and we were glad to see him. Our shells now began to fall amongst the enemy, and this still further roused their indignation. You could hear additional yells and horrid imprecations on the heads of all Christians. No less than three times were we assaulted by enormous odds against us, and each attack was, thank God, successfully repulsed. There we were, a little body, probably not eighty men in all (i.e. Cawnpore Battery, our post, and Captain Germon's), opposed to several thousands of merciless bloodthirsty fanatics. We well knew what we had to expect if we were defeated; and, therefore, each individual fought, as it were, for his very life; each loophole displayed a steady flash of musketry, as defeat would have been certain death to every soul in the garrison. Had the outposts fallen, they were in such immense numbers that we could never have turned the enemy out, and then not a man, woman, or child would have been spared. It was, indeed, a most anxious time, and the more so, as we did not know how matters were progressing at other points. We dreaded that the others might have been even further pressed than we were. At intervals I heard the cry of 'more men this way'; and off would rush two or three (all we could possibly spare) here and there; and then the same cry was repeated in an opposite direction, and then the men had to rush to support their comrades, who were more hotly pressed, and so on; as the pressure became greater at particular places, men rushed to those spots to give assistance. During this trying time even the poor wounded men ran out of the hospitals, and those who had wounds in the legs threw away their crutches, and deliberately knelt down, and fired as fast as they could out of the loopholes. Others, who could do little else, loaded the muskets, whilst the able-bodied soldiers fired; and in this odd manner these brave men of her Majesty's 32nd upheld the honour of their nation, and strained every nerve to repel the furious attacks of the enemy."

Leaving the Cawnpore Battery we pursue our walk past Duprat's Post, where a gallant Frenchman did right good service for us, till we come to a pillar which marks Gubbins's house. This was two stories in height and solidly built of masonry. "On the southern side a spacious and handsome portico marked the principal front, and beyond it soared a lofty forest tree, covered in spring with pale yellow blossoms. During the siege its colossal trunk and massive branches interrupted many a round shot: day by day the boughs were shot away till little but the stem remained. As a huge branch came crashing down, an old Sikh soldier remarked, 'It has repaid all the Company's salt.' The battered trunk of the old tree still stands before the ruins of the house, a striking memorial of the great siege." ¹

From Gubbins's Post we walk to the Begum's Khoite and descend to the subterranean apartments where the ladies passed their days during the siege. One of them has given us a description of their daily life:—

"We all sleep (that is, eleven ladies and seven children) on the floor of the Tye Khana, where we spread mattresses and fit into each other like bits in a puzzle, so as best to feel the punkah. The gentlemen sleep upstairs in a long verandah sort of room on the side of the house least exposed to fire. My bed consists of a purdah and a pillow. In the morning we all roll up our bedding, and pile them in heaps against the wall. We have only room for very few chairs down there, which are assigned to invalids, and most of us take our meals seated on the floor, with our plates on our knees. We are always obliged to light a candle for breakfast and dinner as the room is perfectly dark. Our usual fare consists of stew, as being easiest to cook; it is brought up in a large deckger (copper stew-pan), so as not to dirty a dish, and a portion ladled out to each person. Of course we can get no bread or butter, so chapathies (unleavened cakes) are the disagreeable substitute."

For about half an hour in the evening the women were permitted to sit in the portico and breathe a little fresh air. This was in the fiery month of July. Even in December we are glad to escape from the dark dungeon and find ourselves in the sunlight. Calm and beautiful is the scene. The sky is as blue as in Italy; the sward is as trim and green as in England, and glorious red roses are in full bloom. We mount the steps which lead to the handsome marble cross erected in memory of "Henry Lawrence and the brave men who fell in defence of the Residency." From the topmost step we see in the far distance the city with its cupolas and domes; at the foot of the garden flows the Goomtee, whose banks are lined with cornfields and groves of noble trees. Yet this spot is the scene of a great agony. Here men, women and children dwindled away, worn out by wounds and disease. Here often must they have watched for signs of relief, but for three months the weary eyes saw the dawn burst forth over the city, and the burning sun set, and no succour came to them. Then one day as a flight of bullets swept over their heads a whistling sound was heard and a cry arose from the soldiers, "It is the Minie!" the bullet of the Minié rifle. At once they understood that friends were near, and they gazed searchingly about the lines, but they could only see the enemy firing swiftly and heavily from the flat roofs of the houses. Then, after the lapse of five long minutes they beheld our soldiers fighting their way through one of the main streets. From the Memorial Cross we make our way to the churchyard which lies below. Beneath the shade of some wide-spreading trees there are a multitude of graves, around which are growing bright flowers, and the paths are radiant with roses. The inscriptions tell us the spot contains the sacred dust of heroes. We walk to a plain tomb and slowly read, "Here lies Henry Lawrence, who tried to do his duty. May the Lord have mercy on his soul."

After leaving the Residency, we drive to the great Imambara, or largest room in the world which has an arched roof without supports. The historian of Indian Architecture writes:

"This immense building is covered with vaults of very simple form and still simpler construction, being of a rubble or coarse concrete several feet in thickness, which is laid on a rude mould or centreing of bricks and mud, and allowed to stand a year or two to set and dry. The centreing is then removed, and the vault, being in one piece, stands without abutment or thrust, apparently a better and more durable form of roof than our most scientific Gothic vaulting, certainly far cheaper and far more easily made, since it is literally cast on a mud form, which may be moulded into any shape the fancy of the architect may dictate."

The Imambara was built by the Nawab Asuf-ud-daulah, in the year of the great famine, 1784, in order to afford relief to the famine-stricken people. Legend relates that many of high rank were driven by hunger to join in the work, and that to spare their feelings their names were called out at night and their wages paid to them. The monarch invited the architects to submit their plans to competition, and only stipulated that the building should be no mere copy, and that it should surpass all other buildings in beauty and magnificence. The magnificent ornaments and decorations which adorned the building have perished, but the Imambara stands a graceful monument of the monarch who erected it and who lies buried in it. It was after the reign of Asuf-ud-daulah that buildings began to be erected in Lucknow, which are the most debased example of architecture in India. A court steeped in luxury and vice sought only to erect palaces bastard in style and of tawdry splendour.
CITIES OF INDIA

From the Imambara we drive past the Residency to the Kaisar Bagh, or Garden of Cæsar, built by the ex-King, Waji Ali Shah, at a cost of eighty lakhs, and, entering the gateway, pass up an open court in front of the gateway, called the Jilarkhana or place from which the royal procession used to start. An old traveller, who wrote an interesting account of a "Tour along the Ganges and Jumna," has given a graphic description of a royal procession in Lucknow:

"As we approach the grand gateway the massive folding doors flew open, and the Nawab advanced surrounded and followed by his principal courtiers, all on elephants richly caparisoned, and they in their most splendid and costly costumes. This spectacle was uncommonly grand and impressive, the richness of the housings of the elephants, fifty in number, the immense and gaudy banners, the spirited and beautiful Arab horses: all this splendid pageant, bursting at once from a noble gateway embosomed in a wood, had an effect at once magnificent and highly picturesque."

Passing through a gateway covered by a screen, we cross the Chini Bagh (so called from the large China vessels with which it was decorated), and passing under a gate flanked by green mermaids, we reach the Hazrat Bagh. On the right is the Chandiwal Barahdari, which used to be paved with silver, and the Badshah Manzil which used to be the special residence of the King. On the left is a file of buildings called the Chaulakhi, built by the royal barber and sold to his sovereign for four lakhs. Here resided the Begum and her chief ladies, and in the days of the Mutiny the rebel Queen here held her court. In one of the stables nigh at hand were confined the British captives who were taken from hence to be cruelly murdered. Passing onward, we come to another great gateway which leads to a fine open square, the buildings round which were occupied chiefly by ladies of the harem. A little beyond this we reach a building known as Kaiser Pasand, or Cæsar’s Pleasure, surmounted by a gilt semi-circle and hemisphere: in it three English ladies and two Englishmen were confined during the Mutiny, and from it led to be brutally massacred with the other captives. Opposite the door of the Kaisar Bagh is the monument which marks the spot where the foul deed was perpetrated. Raja Lal Singh, a great and influential landlord, followed the prisoners to the fatal scene and mounted one of the gates of the Kaisar Bagh, since destroyed, in order to better feast his eyes on the dying agonies of the victims. After the Mutiny he had been received back into favour, his rebellion was condoned by the amnesty, and he must have persuaded himself that the memory of his deed had faded away, when justice overtook him. His confidential servants turned against him, and thus link after link, a wonderful chain of circumstantial evidence developed itself and brought home his guilt. Two years after the commission of his crime, on the very spot on which it was committed, he was hanged.

From the Kaisar Bagh we drove to the Farad Bakhsh Palace, which was for many years the Royal residence. S'adat Ali Khan, the half brother to Asuf-ud-daulah, purchased the part which overhangs the river from the French adventurer, Claude Martin, and added the rest. A spacious throne-room was set apart for Royal Durbars. At the accession of a new King the Resident used to place him on the throne, and then present to him a nazar to show that the British acknowledged his Government. A fair pilgrim who visited Lucknow half a century ago has described the ceremony:

"The King went into the next apartment, where the Resident, with all due form, having taken off the King's turban, placed the crown upon his head, and he ascended the _musnad._"

"I was standing next to the Resident and the Prime Minister, when, during a part of the ceremony, a shower of precious stones was thrown over us. I looked at the Resident and saw him move his arm to allow the valuables that had fallen upon him to drop to the ground; I imitated his example by moving my scarf, on which some were caught; it would have been infra dig. to have retained them; they fell to the ground and were scrambled for by the natives; the shower consisted of emeralds, rubies, pearls, etc., etc."

After the ceremony was over, the lady visited the zenana of the King, and writes thus to a lady friend:

"But the present King's wives were superbly dressed and looked like creatures of the Arabian Tales. Indeed, one (Taj Mahal) was so beautiful, that I could think of nothing but Lalla Rookh in her bridal attire. I never saw any one so lovely, either black or white. Her features were perfect, and such eyes and eyelashes I never beheld before. She is the favourite Queen at present, and has only been married a month or two; her age, about fourteen; and such a little creature, with the smallest hands and feet, and the most timid, modest look imaginable. You would have been charmed with her, she was so graceful and fawn-like. Her dress was of gold and scarlet brocade, and her hair was literally strewed with pearls, which hung down upon her neck in long single strings, terminating in large pearls, which mixed with and hung as low as her hair, which was curled on each side her head in long ringlets, like Charles the Second's beauties. On her forehead she wore a small gold circlet, from which depended and hung, half way down, large pearls interspersed with emeralds. Above this was a paradise plume, from which strings of pearls were carried over the head, as we turn our hair. Her earrings were immense gold rings, with pearls and emeralds suspended all round in large strings, the pearls increasing in size. She had a nose-ring also with large round pearls and emeralds; and her necklaces, etc., were too numerous to be described. She wore long sleeves, open at the elbow; and her dress was a full petticoat with a tight body attached, and open only at the throat. She had several persons to bear her train when she walked; and her women stood behind her couch to arrange her head-dress, when, in moving, her pearls got entangled in the immense robe of scarlet and gold she had thrown around her. This beautiful creature is the envy of all the other wives, and the favourite at present of both the king and his mother, both of whom have given her titles."

From the Farad Bakhsh we drive to the Shah Najif, which was built in 1814 by Ghazi-ud-din Haidar, and it is now his mausoleum. It is a white mosque, with an immense dome, of no architectural worth. Inside are some quaint interesting pictures of the Nawabs of Oude and the lights of their harem. The Shah Najif is chiefly interesting to the traveller on account of its being the scene of a most stubborn and critical struggle in Sir Colin Campbell’s first relief of Lucknow. After lighting every inch of ground from the first streak of dawn, our troops reached it as the afternoon was waning. It barred the way to the Residency. Sir Colin Campbell determined to carry it before nightfall, and Peel, who has won a high place in the roll of England’s heroes, brought up his Naval brigade and placed his 24-pounders, mortars and battery before the mosque.

“For three hours the bombardment lasted, and no impression was made on the stout walls. For three hours the Shah Najif sent forth a perennial stream of fire but to be checked by our heavy guns. To remain was sheer death. To retreat by the narrow defile blocked by troops was out of the question. The moment was decisive. Colin Campbell collecting the 93rd around him said unto them, 'I had no intention of employing you again to-day, but the Shah Najif must be taken. The artillery cannot drive the enemy out, so you must with the bayonet.'”¹ Thus spoke the old chief, and he stirred the spirit and soul of every man by telling them that he would lead them himself. Peel, manning again all his guns, redoubled his fire. Under cover of this heavy cannonade the 93rd advanced, and “the grey-haired veteran of many fights rode, with his sword drawn, at their head. Keen was his eye as when in the pride of youth he led the stormers at Sebastion. They went on steadily till before them towered a wall twenty feet high, from whose parapet and countless loopholes came in blasts a storm of musket balls. Many fell. The assailants replied to their slayers with musketry yet with little effect, and no ladders were available for escalading the ramparts. Nothing to be done but to break them. Peel poured his broadsides into the stout massive walls. But no impression was made on the solid masonry. Never did English soldiers and sailors distinguish themselves more than on this afternoon. They worked the guns, though every moment many were killed and more were wounded. But while their own losses were terrible, they could inflict but little in return. They were being destroyed by bullets and that was all. Day was fast turning into night. The rocket tubes were brought up, and while they discharged their fiery missiles into the building, Peel, with the reluctance of a brave man, slowly withdrew his guns. At this moment fifty Highlanders, creeping stealthily through the brushwood, guided by Sergeant Paton of the regiment, reached a rent in the wall which Paton had discovered. A soldier was pushed up with some difficulty. He reported that no enemy could be seen. Several men immediately followed. A company of sappers were sent for, who quickly arriving enlarged the opening and more Highlanders entered. The small party pushing on gained the main gateway and threw it open for their comrades. The white dresses of the last of the garrison were just seen gliding away amidst the rolling smoke in the dark shadows of the night.”¹

Midway between the Shah Najif and the Kaisar Bagh is the mess house, a strongly built plain house which at the time of Sir Colin’s advance was defended by a ditch twelve feet broad and scarped with masonry; beyond that there was a loopholed wall. Sir Colin, in order to save his infantry, had determined to use his guns as much as possible, and it was after the building had been battered for about three hours, and the musketry fire of the enemy had begun to slacken, that the Chief, thinking it might be stormed "without much risk," gave the order to advance. The storming party consisted of a company of the 90th Foot, under Captain Wolseley and a picquet of her Majesty's 53rd under Captain Hopkins, supported by Major Barnston's battalion of detachments, under Captain Guise, Her Majesty's 83rd Foot, and some of the Punjab Infantry under Lieutenant Powell. The mess house was carried immediately with a rush, and by order of the chief, Lieutenant Roberts, assisted by Sir David Baird and Captain Hopkins, planted, under a shower of bullets, a regimental colour on one of its turrets to show Outram and Havelock how far they had advanced. Twice was it shot down. "Notwithstanding, I managed," writes Lord Roberts, "to prop it up a third time on the turret, and it was not again hit, though the enemy continued to fire at it for some time." The troops then pressed forward with great vigour and lined the wall separating the mess house from the Moti Mahal. Here the enemy made their last stand. Captain Wolseley sent for some sappers, who coming up made openings in the wall through which the troops poured and attacked the network of buildings within. The rebels fought stubbornly, but they were driven at the point of the bayonet from room to room, and after the lapse of some time thrust forth from the vast enclosure. "The relieving forces and garrison were now separated by only twenty-five yards, but an iron tempest swept across the open road." Colonel Napier and Lieutenant Sitwell were wounded in running the gauntlet of fire, but Outram and Havelock crossed over unhurt to the outside wall of the mess house enclosure. An opening was quickly made by the sappers through which they entered. On the sward sloping down from the mess house stood Colin Campbell, and a blaze of shot and musketry from the Kaisar Bagh rose upon them as the three veterans met. "This was a very cordial meeting," wrote Hope Grant, "and a cordial shaking of hands took place. On Outram privation had not told so heavily, but the hand of death was on Havelock, though he lighted up a little on being told for the first time that he was Sir Henry." Loud rang the cheers as the news spread along from post to post that the three Generals had met. "The relief of the besieged garrison had been accomplished." In these few terse words their Commander-in-Chief announced the accomplishment of a brilliant achievement, guided by a master hand, and brought to a successful close by the pluck of the British soldier. "Every man in the force," wrote Sir Colin, "had exerted himself to the utmost, and now met with his reward."

After leaving the Shah Najif we drove to the Secunder Bagh (Alexander Garden), which was the scene of one of the most stubborn and sanguinary contests during the mutiny. It is a high-walled enclosure about one hundred yards square, with bastions at the angles and carefully loopholed. In the centre was a two-storied house which Wajid Ali built for one of his ladies, Sikandar Mahal. Sir Colin Campbell did not use the language of exaggeration when he wrote, "There never was a bolder feat of arm than the storming of Secunder Bagh." The enemy finding escape impossible, fought with the courage of despair an the fury of religious hate. "A din of hideous noises rose into the air, the rattle of musketry: the curses, and yells of sepoys, the fierce cry of the British soldier: 'Remember Cawnpore, boys!'" Next morning the bodies of two thousand sepoys, dressed in their old uniforms, lay in heaps. And now where curses and yells and the rattle of musket and cries of death sounded: silence.

From the Secunder Bagh we proceed to the fantastic pile of buildings which the French adventurer, Claude Martin, erected as a residence for himself. Martin was a native of the city of Lyons, and served under Lally in the regiment of Loraine. After Chandernagore was taken by Clive he entered the service of the East India Company, and rose to the rank of Captain. He then entered the service of the Nawab of Oude, but was allowed by the Company to retain his rank and enjoy promotion. The Marquis of Hastings, who, when Governor-General, visited Lucknow (October, 1814), writes:

"The house, built in the English style, stands upon a gentle elevation with some extent of lawn about it. On returning to Constantia I had the opportunity of considering that mansion. It was erected by General Martyn, a native of Lyons in France, who came to India as a private soldier. Having got into the service of Asoph-oo-Dowlah, he distinguished himself by his talents so as to obtain rapid promotion; but his strict accuracy to punctuality in all pecuniary concerns was more beneficial to him. His character in that respect became so established that the natives who had amassed money and dreaded the rapacious gripe of the sovereign, entrusted their riches to the care of General Martyn. Such amplitude of funds enabled him to take advantage of many favourable opportunities, and to make many advantageous speculations, so that he gathered extraordinary wealth. He expended some of it in erecting this house on a plan entirely his own. The idea of it was probably taken from those castles of pastry which used to adorn desserts in former days. The mansion consisted of three stories gradually diminishing in the size of the square, so as to leave to the two upper stories a broad space between the apartments and the parapet which covered the wall of the story below it. This was for the purpose of defence, with a view to which the building was constructed. The doors of the principal floor were plated with iron, and each window was protected by an iron grate. Loopholes from passages above gave the means of firing in perfect security upon any persons who should force their way into these lower apartments. The spiral stone staircases were blocked

at intervals with iron doors; in short, the whole was framed for protracted and desperate resistance. The parapets and pinnacles were decorated with a profusion of plaster lions, Grecian gods, and Chinese figures, forming the most whimsical assemblage imaginable. Still, the magnitude of the building, with its cupolas and spires, gave it a certain magnificence."

Leaving the Martinière, there is yet one spot sacred to Englishmen to be visited before quitting Lucknow. It is the tomb of Havelock. A lofty obelisk marks his resting-place:

"On the low plain by the Alum Bagh," wrote a gallant soldier,
"they made his humble grave; and Campbell and Outram, and Inglis, and many a stout soldier who had followed him in all his headlong march, and through the long fatal street, were gathered there to perform the last rites to one of England's noblest dead. As long as the memory of great deeds, and high courage, and spotless self-devotion is cherished amongst his countrymen, so long will Havelock's lonely tomb in the grove beneath the scorching Eastern sky, hard by the vast city, the scene alike of his toil, his triumph and his death, be regarded as one of the most holy of the many holy spots where her patriot soldiers lie."
THE story of Cawnpore is as tragic as the tale of the last agonies of the Athenian host in Sicily, and it will be of interest to Englishmen as long as we care to remember the story of our people. Some of our Indian administrators would like to destroy all memory of that great agony of our race, the Indian Mutiny. But time cannot utterly destroy the written records of great events or the theatre of their enactment. The ridge at Delhi, the Lucknow Residency, and the Ghat at Cawnpore are the witnesses of that world-wide tragedy which the flow of centuries will not wipe from memory. And it would not be well they should be effaced. The story of the Mutiny is the prose epic of our Indian Empire, and those who read it in the right spirit will find something beyond cruel atrocities, exciting adventures, or battle scenes. And nowhere surely do the lessons which the Indian Mutiny convey speak with a clearer and nobler voice than they speak at the Residency at Lucknow and the ill-fated Ghat at Cawnpore.

The city of Cawnpore, forty miles south-west of Lucknow, lies on the south bank of the Ganges which formed from very ancient times the frontier defence of the people of Oude and Bengal against their northern neighbours. When Clive decided to maintain and strengthen Oude as a friendly state interposed between Bengal and Northern India, he selected Cawnpore on account of its advanced and commanding position as the best station in the Nawab of Oude’s dominions to canton the brigade lent to him subject to a subsidy for the protection of the frontier. In 1801, when Cawnpore was comprehended within the limits of the Company’s powers, it became the frontier station of the time, and attained the prominent military position of being the headquarters of the field command of Bengal, a command which, while including the King’s and Company’s troops, artillery, cavalry and infantry, amounted to 40,000 effectives. The advance of our frontier to the north, however, occasioned a revisal of our military position, and Cawnpore was most unwisely denuded of its European troops. In the spring of 1857 sixty-one European artillerymen with six guns were the only representatives of the English army at Cawnpore. And at Cawnpore resided the pretender to the honours of the Mah-ratta Peshwa. The native troops consisted of the 1st, 53rd and 56th Native Infantry, the 2nd Cavalry, and the native gunners attached to the battery, about 3,000 in number. Most of these men had been recruited from the neighbouring province of Oude, whose annexation had touched their pride and affected their interests. It only required a single act of imprudence—the greased cartridges which roused their caste prejudices—to drive them to mutiny. In May, 1857, the officer in command of the Cawnpore division was Major-General Sir Hugh Wheeler, K.C.B., who had for upwards of fifty years been attached to the Bengal army, had served with it in quarters and on the field: who had fought and bled in its ranks, who had a pride in the courage and devotion of the sepoy and a thorough knowledge of his language and mode of life. But no European can completely gauge the feelings and passions of an Oriental. General Wheeler visited the lines daily and had long conversations with |the men in the hope of maintaining their confidence and of allaying the feverish excitability which had arisen on account of the belief that their religion was being endangered by the use of defiled cartridges. The men conversed with the General and his son, his aide-de-camp, without reserve and without any sign of sullenness, but their fears were not allayed nor their anxiety lessened. On June 3 General Wheeler reported to the Governor-General—

“All quiet, but subject to constant fits of excitement.”
At a late hour that evening he despatched another message to Lord Canning. “Sir Henry Lawrence having expressed some uneasiness, I have just sent him by dak gharrics out of my small force two officers and fifty men, Her Majesty’s 84th foot; any conveyance for more not available. This leaves me weak, but I trust holding my own until more Europeans arrive.”

This was the last message that reached Lord Canning from Sir Hugh Wheeler and it was worthy of the gallant soldier. He had at a comrade’s call demurred his own scanty command, though every day brought him fresh reports of the mutineers’ intentions to surround him. The very evening that he sent forth fifty men to the aid of Henry Lawrence news reached him that an outbreak of the cavalry was imminent, so he issued orders that the women and non-combatants should assemble within the entrenchment, and that night about eight hundred souls went to their prison-grave. Of these about four hundred were women and children. To guard them there were about two hundred English soldiers of all arms, eighty officers, a few civilians and a small body of loyal sepoys.¹

The places where the women and children assembled were two large barracks, formerly the hospital barracks of a dragoon regiment, and at the time occupied by the depot of Her Majesty’s 32nd Regiment consisting of the invalids, and women and children of the regiment. They were single-storied buildings, intended each for the accommodation of a company of one hundred men; one of them was thatched and both were surrounded by a flat-roofed arcade or verandah. The walls were of brick, and the usual out-offices were attached to the building. In order that they might resist a sudden attack a trench was dug around these barracks and the earth thrown up on the outside so as to form a parapet about five feet high, and they were armed at their principal points by artillery. Ten guns constituted the sole defence by artillery of the entrenchment, and a mud wall, not even bullet proof at the crest, was its sole bulwark. A stately church now marks the site where the hospital stood, and a row of pillars indicate what may be called the line of fortifications. As we stood at the door of the church one December morning, we saw in the plain beyond the thin red line of the British soldiers, and the drums and fifes sent forth a lively tune. Looking out in the early morning—the morning of Sunday, June 7,—the besieged saw the enemy busy erecting batteries. Some hours after sunrise they opened fire. Hour by hour the fire grew more severe and dangerous as the enemy got their guns into position. "All through this first weary day the shrieks of the women and children were terrific; as often as the balls struck the walls of the barracks, their wailings were heart-breaking, but after the initiation of that first day they had learnt silence, and never uttered a sound except when groaning from the horrible mutilations they had to endure. When night sheltered them, our cowardly assailants closed in upon the entrenchments, and harassed us with incessant volleys of musketry." Men, women, and children fell victims to the enemy's fire. But the survivors were more to be pitied than the dead. The pressure of famine became every day more severe. "All were reduced to the monotonous and scanty allowance of one meal a day, consisting of a handful of split peas and a handful of flour, certainly not more than half a pint together, for the daily ration.” Now and then the scanty fare was increased by some horse-soup, and it became a more cherished object to shoot a horse than its rider. “One day a strange dog approached the entrenchment. The cur had wandered from the sepoy barrack, and every possible blandishment was employed by my men to tempt the canine adventurer into the soup-kettle. Two or three minutes subsequently to my seeing him doubtfully trotting across the open, I was offered some of his semi-roasted fabric, but that, more scrupulous than others, I was obliged to decline.” Not far from the church is the only well from which the besieged could procure water. The masonry bears marks of the innumerable bullets which struck it—for the enemy invariably fired grape upon the spot as soon as any person made his appearance, or at night if they heard the creaking of the tackle. The frame work of beam and brick which protected the drawers was soon shot away. The machinery went next, and the buckets were thenceforward hauled up hand over hand from a depth of more than sixty feet. As we stood at the well, we thought of John Mackillop of the Civil Service, one of England’s authentic heroes. Veiling devotion under a jejune pretence of self-depreciation, he told his friends that, though no fighting man, he was willing to make himself useful where he could, and accordingly he took his post at the well. He drew water for the women and children as often as he could, but his tenure of office was of short duration. It was less than a week after he had undertaken this self-denying service, when his numerous escapes were followed by a grape-shot wound in the groin, and speedy death. Disinterested even in death, his last words were an earnest entreaty that “somebody would go and draw water for a lady to whom he had promised it.” The soldiers could not bear to hear the cry of the thirsty children, and at the cost of many heroic lives it was procured. Captain Thomson, one of the survivors of the siege, writes: "I have seen the children of my brother officers sucking the pieces of old water-bags, putting scraps of canvas and leather straps into the mouth to try and get a single drop of moisture upon their parched lips." On the eighth day of the siege a shell filled with combustible materials settled in the thatch of the hospital, and the whole structure was burnt. Then two hundred women and children had to pass twelve days and nights in the trenches upon the bare ground. Many of them were delicately nurtured ladies, who had never known what privation was. But the hour of danger proved their heroic worth. They uttered no cry of despair. They handed round the ammunition, encouraged the men to the uttermost, and with tender solicitude attended to the wounded. Kindly death came to some, and put an end to their toil and sorrow. A single shell killed and wounded several of them who were seated in the ditch. Mistress White was walking with a twin child at either shoulder, and her husband by her side. The same ball slew the father, broke both elbows of the mother, and severely injured one of the orphans. "I saw her afterwards," writes Captain Thomson, "in the mainguard lying upon her back, with the two children, twins, laid one at each breast, while the mother's bosom refused not what her arms had no power to administer." Day by day the number of the garrison grew less while the number of the enemy increased. The rebels made a determined assault on the entrenchments, and were driven back by the heroic defenders. They then determined to treat with the English. Reduced to the last extremity, the small remnant of British troops made terms securing a safe passage down the river for the women and children and their companions. It was the only resource. The treaty was made with Nana Sahib, the adopted son of the last Peshwa, whose claim to the pension settled on the Sovereign of the Mahrattas Lord Dalhousie rightly disallowed. No suspicion of treachery crossed the minds of the troops, because the Nana had cultivated the society of Englishmen and had showered his civilities upon them. It was to him that Sir Hugh Wheeler in the hour of distress applied for assistance, but at the moment of the Mutiny he put himself at the head of the rebels.

ghat, where took place the foul massacre. Above the ghat is a temple dedicated to cruel Śiva. But his fane is fast falling into ruins. Seated on the steps of the temple it is hard to realize that historical tragedy. All around is so calm and peaceful. No sound breaks the stillness of the air. Not a breath of air ruffles the broad waters of the Ganges. A country boat is floating down the stream, and the wide white sails catch the golden rays of the sun as it rises above the horizon this fresh December morning. It was the fiery month of June forty-five years ago, when the small band who had so heroically defended the entrenchments embarked on the boats drawn up on the long sandbank which stretches below us. As soon as the last man was on board, the word "Off" was given—a welcome sound after a weary month of hardship and imprisonment. But the command fell on traitorous ears. A blast of a bugle was heard, and at the signal the crew leaped into the water and waded towards dry ground. Before they quitted the boats, they had secreted burning charcoal in the straw roofs, and now they burst forth into a flame. From every bush that lined the bank came forth a deadly shower of bullets, and from the house to our left, where we see an English child playing, two guns poured forth a storm of grape. The men tried to push the boats into mid-current, but all in vain. Then was witnessed a scene without its parallel in history or fiction. "Some of the boats presented a broadside to the guns, others were raked from stern to stem by the shot. Volumes of smoke from the thatch somewhat veiled the full extent of the horrors of that morning. All who could move were speedily expelled from the boats by the heat of the flames. Alas! the wounded were burnt to death: one mitigation only there was to their horrible fate—the flames were terribly fierce, and their intense sufferings were not protracted. Wretched multitudes of women and children crouched behind the boats, or waded out into the deeper water, and stood up to their chins in the river to lessen the probability of being shot.” The troopers drawn up near the temple then plunged into the water, and sabred those whom the bullets spared. At length two hundred women and children were all that were left of the heroic garrison. And they were led back along the road which they had come, past the entrenchments which their husbands had so valiantly defended, past their old homes, now in ruins, to the pavilion of the Maharajah, who, after reviewing his captives, ordered them to be taken to the Assembly Rooms—the scene of many a former festive gathering—and confined there. On July 1 he ordered them to be removed to a house which had been occupied by a native clerk. It comprised two rooms twenty feet long and ten broad, and a number of dark closets which had been intended for the use of servants, and an open court some fifteen feet square. Here for a fortnight in July were confined these tender women and delicate children. They had no furniture, no beds, not even straw to lie upon. They were fed with only one meal a day, consisting of coarse bread and dhall. On July 15 news reached Cawnpore that Havelock’s victorious army was within a day’s march of the city. A Council, over which the Nana presided, was held and it was resolved that the prisoners must be slain. A stern retribution the leading rebels knew would be exacted by the British troops for the innocent blood already shed, and many who had aided and abetted their chief dreaded their recognition by some of the prisoners who had long resided at Cawnpore. Having decided that all the captives should be put to death the assembly dispersed. That evening at 6 p.m. the women and children were hacked to pieces by five ruffians of the Nana’s guard. When darkness, as darkness itself and as the shadow of death, fell, the groans ceased and “the doors of the buildings were closed.” Over the events of that wicked night a gloomy mist still hangs, unpenetrated and for ever unpenetrable. Three hours after the break of day the doors were opened and the bodies removed and thrown into a well hard by.¹

From the ghat we drive to the Memorial Gardens. We enter the iron gates, and walk up the broad path lined with noble trees. The grass is as trim and green as an English lawn, and the beds are bright with flowers, and the road is lined with bushes of yellow and dark crimson roses. The air is sweet with scent of orange flowers. Slowly we mount the steps, and read the solemn words engraved on the marble pedestal which covers the fatal well:—"Sacred to the Perpetual Memory of a Great Company of Christian People, chiefly Women and Children." The ugly Gothic memorial and the somewhat meretricious figure of an angel in white marble mars the solemnity of the spot. As in the Coliseum at Rome, the only symbol above that well should have been the symbol of a great agony, the symbol of the Cross, the symbol of the faith in which these women who lie quiet and undisturbed in the well beneath lived and died. "And it was said unto them that they should rest yet for a little season?"
